CHATTANOOGA FOUNDRY & PIPE-

(127 Fed. 23.)

1. A municipal corporation engaged in the business of supplying water to its inhabitants for profit, which is injured in the purchase of necessary supplies by a combination among producers which is invalid under the anti-trust act, is entitled to maintain an action for redress under the provisions of that act.
2. Members of a combination to enhance the price of a commodity, which is void under the anti-trust act, who share in the profits secured by the combination, cannot claim exemption from suit on the part of a consumer under the provisions of the statute, on the ground that no direct purchase was made from them, nor complain that all the members of the combination were not made parties to the action.

3. That a consumer injured in the purchase of supplies by a combination, illegal under the anti-trust act, is not engaged in an interstate business, does not deprive it of a right of action under the provisions of that act.
4. The action provided by the 7th section of the act of 1890, in favor of a consumer injured by an illegal combination, is not penal so as to be governed by the provisions of the Federal statute prescribing the limitation period for the commencement of such actions.
5. An action by one injured by being compelled to pay an excessive price for supplies because of a combination in violation of the anti-trust act, to recover three times the amount of the loss as authorized by the statute, is not governed by a statute limiting the time of bringing actions for injuries to personal or real property and actions for the detention or con-create a limited monopoly. Columbia Wire Co. v. Freeman Wire Co. 71 Fed. 302.

In an action by a corporation against a city to recover the price of a bridge built by the plaintiff for the defendant, the fact that the plaintiff is a trust or combination within the Illinois trust act of 1891 cannot be interposed as a defense, as that fact must be determined in a direct proceeding, as the statute is silent as to the method to be pursued in determining whether a corporation seeking to enforce a claim comes within the prohibition of the act, and there has been no long established usage in the premises. Lafayette Bridge Co. v. Streater, 105 Fed. 729.

In an action by a corporation originally formed for the purpose of manufacturing strawboards, upon a lease made by it to a company organized ostensibly for the manufacture, purchase, and sale of strawboards, but which really had no such object, but was formed for the purpose of reducing the production and raising the price of that commodity, such lease being guaranteed by another company, which controlled a large number of strawboard manufacturing establishments throughout the country, and afterwards assigned by the lessee to its guarantor, the whole transaction being in effect an arrangement between the company named as lessor in the lease and the corporation, which was the guarantor and assignee thereof, whereby the corporation leasing its premises and manufacturing plant agreed in that form to cease operating its plant for the purpose of reducing the production, and thereby enabling the corporation, which was the guarantor and assignee of the lease, to raise the price of strawboards,—it was held that such transaction was a mere shift or device gotten up for the purpose of limiting the production of strawboards, and fixing its price, in violation of the law of the state known as the anti-trust act, and the lease was, therefore, void, and no recovery could be had thereon. American Strawboard Co. v. Peoria Strawboard Co. 65 Ill. App. 502.

life of the contract certain patterns furnished him by the other party, and not to sell or deal in, directly or indirectly, other patterns than those manufactured by the other party, and to sell them at a fixed price only, is not a violation of the statute of Illinois relating to trusts and combinations, as the statute does not apply to a contract whereby an agent is created to sell specific articles; and by the terms of the statute the limitations put upon an agent in the sale of his principal's goods are not affected. Welboldt v. Standard Fashion Co. 80 Ill. App. 67.

a. Indiana.

The anti-trust law of Indiana of 1897 was prospective, and not retrospective; it was not intended to, and did not, affect contracts previously made, nor their enforcement, and has no application whatever to such contracts; and so, where a contract sued upon was entered into and performed by the plaintiff, and the amount thereof was due and payable by defendant nearly two years before that law took effect, the fact that the plaintiff had entered into an agreement, contract, and combination in violation of the act of 1897 is no defense to the action. Sterling Remedy Co. v. Wyckoff, S. & B. 154 Ind. 437, 56 N. E. 911.

The act of the 22d General Assembly of Iowa, chap. 84, § 1 (McClain's Code, 5454), inhibiting any pool, trust, agreement, or combination or confederation to fix the price of oil, lumber, coal, grain, flour, provisions, or any other commodity or article whatever, covers a compact between local insurance agents to fix rates upon all risks of insurance within a certain locality, as insurance is a commodity. *Beechley v. ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Tennessee to review a judgment in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover the amount provided by the anti-trust act for injuries caused by an illegal combination. Reversed.

Statement by Lorton, Circuit Judge:

This was an action to recover damages under the 7th section of the act of Congress of July 2, 1890, chap. 647 (26 Stat. at L. 210 [U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3202]), known as the "anti-trust act." The plaintiff is a municipal corporation of the state of Georgia. The defendants are two manufacturing corporations of the state of Tennessee, engaged in the business of making and selling cast-iron pipe and fittings.

The declaration averred that on or about the 28th of December, 1894, the said two companies entered into an unlawful combination for the purpose of restraining interstate trade and commerce with four other corporations engaged in the same line of manufacture, to wit, the Anniston Pipe & Foundry Company, and the Howard-Harrison Iron Company, both corporations of the state of Alabama, and conducting business in that state; the Dennis, Long, & Co., a corporation of the state of Kentucky, and carrying on its business in said state; and the Addyston Pipe & Steel Company, a corporation of the state of Ohio, engaged in business at Cincinnati in that state. The illegal trust agreement complained of is the identical trust which was dissolved by decree of this court in the case reported as United States v. Addyston Pipe & Steel Co.

Foreign insurance companies doing business in Kansas, that combine to control and increase the rates of insurance on property within a city in that state violate the provision of chap. 257 of the Laws of 1889, being "an act to declare unlawful trusts and combinations in restraint of trade and products, and to provide penalties therefor;" and their local agents, who attempt to, and do, enforce such combined rates, are subject to prosecution under the provisions of said act. State v. Phipps, 50 Kan. 609, 18 L. R. A. 657, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 297, 34 Am. St. Rep. 152, 31 Pac. 1097.

Where a boiler company sold two large boilers to a person, and took in part payment therefor his two promissory notes, and the contract was made and signed by the maker and indorser of the notes, by which it was agreed that the boiler company should retain as security for the payment of the notes the ownership and title of the boilers, and that, if the debt was not paid when due, the possession of the boilers might be taken by the boiler company; and the notes and contract were thereafter assigned to one who brought an action of replevin against the maker and indorser of the notes to recover the possession of the boilers, and, after the commencement of the action, assigned the contracts securing their payment to the plaintiff herein, who had been substituted as such,—an answer that the plaintiff was a member of a trust created by a combination of two similar companies, which had combined to destroy the quantity of salt to be produced, the proportion of the salt business which should be done by each corporation, and the price at which it should be sold to consumers, is no defense to the action, as, although the language of the anti-trust act is general, it is manifest that the legislature, in aiming to prevent the enforcement of the illegal arrangement or contracts prohibited by the act, evidently did not intend to deprive persons of any civil rights, or place them outside the protection of the law, or to inflict penalties or punishments without a trial conducted under the safeguards which the Constitution provides; and the provision invoked was intended to apply where the unlawful arrangement, contract, or interest was sought to be enforced, or some step taken designed to promote the operation of the unlawful trust, combination, or conspiracy. Barton v. Mulvane, 59 Kan. 313, 52 Pac. 883.

In an action against an ice company for breach of contract for failure to deliver ice the plaintiff cannot enhance his damages by alleging and proving that the failure of the defendant corporation to deliver the ice was in consequence of its having sold all its ice to another corporation under a combination or conspiracy in violation of the anti-trust laws, as the motive which actuated the defendants in violating their contract was an immaterial consideration. *Crystal Ice Co. v. An agreement between all the grain buyers of a town among themselves to defeat the grain

The declaration, in substance, charges that the plaintiff was engaged in conducting a system of waterworks, and that it derived a large revenue from the sale of water to private consumers, the income going into the city treasury; that, for the purposes and uses of its said waterworks business, it bought during the operations of said unlawful trust a large supply of iron water pipe, and that the contract for its supply of such pipe was given to the Anniston Pipe & Foundry Company as the lowest bidder. It is then averred that, by reason of the said unlawful agreement between the said producers of said pipe, all competition was suppressed, and that the said Anniston company obtained the contract through an arrangement by which it was to be allowed to obtain same at a price agreed upon between said conspirators, without any competition, and that for this privilege it agreed to pay, and did pay, to the said association a large sum, called a "bonus," which was to be divided between the parties to said arrangement in agreed proportions. It is, in effect, charged that the "bonus" constituted the difference between the fair and reasonable value of the pipe so bought by plaintiff, and the price which it was compelled to pay, and that this large and unreasonable price was extorted from plaintiff through the unlawful suppression of competition, and by the instrumentality of fictitious bids put in by other parties to said association, so arranged as to create the semblance of competition, and yet secure the contract for the Anniston company at trade at that place, which permitted any one of them to buy as much grain as he chose and to pay for it such price as he chose, nevertheless, providing that, if he purchased more than his allotted share he should pay to the others 3 cents per bushel for the excess bought; which agreement was entered into for the express purpose of preventing competition among the buyers, and had that effect; and for the further purpose of pooling the profits of the grain trade and the formation of a grain trust among the buyers, and it had that effect,—is such an agreement as would have been void and nonenforceable at common law, and falls within the condemnation of the anti-trust act of 1897; as, in enacting that law, it was competent for the legislature to make penal the doing of that which the courts themselves recognized as hurtful to the body politic, and for that purpose refused to countenance; and, in passing the act mentioned, the legislature did no more; and a conviction for violation of the act was affirmed. State v. Smiley, 65 Kan. 240, 69 Pac. 199.

Members of an association, against whom a penalty or fine has been imposed for an infraction of the by-laws or rules of the association, cannot maintain an action against the association or its officers to enjoin them from suspending the plaintiffs from membership in said association, and to compel the defendants to retain the plaintiff in their membership therein, on the ground that the association is a combination or conspiracy in violation of the anti-trust law (Laws 1891, chap. 158). *Greer v. Although the association might control and fix the price of property, merchandise, etc., and, in so doing, be guilty of a violation of the statute, yet, if they refused to sell such merchandise or property, it does not follow that one could maintain an action for damages because of their refusal to sell to him."

the price set by the combination as the ostensible lowest bidder. The plaintiff avers that, by reason of the formation of said illegal combination, interstate commerce in cast-iron pipe was restrained, and plaintiff compelled to deal only with the said Anniston company, and to pay a price agreed upon by the members of the combination, which was unreasonable; that the bonus so paid out of the price paid by plaintiff was paid into a common pocket, and divided among the conspirators in an agreed way; and that the two Tennessee corporations here sued received their due proportion of said bonus according to the terms and plans of the scheme. By all of which the plaintiff avers that it was compelled to pay for the cast-iron pipe so bought and used in its said waterworks $15,000 more than would have been paid but for the said unlawful trust between the producers of such pipe, and it lays the damage to its business and property at triple the said excess price so paid and reasonable attorneys' fees.

The defendants plead the general issue of not guilty, and the Tennessee statutes of limitations of one and three years.

Upon the conclusion of all of the evidence, the court instructed the jury to find for the defendants. This has been assigned as error, and this writ sued out by the plaintiff below.

Mr. Frank Spurlock for defendants in error.

The plaintiff's action is to recover damages incurred in its "business or property"

While there may be some doubt as to the 84 L. R. A.

validity of the act declaring certain contracts, agreements, undertakings, and combinations unlawful, and to provide punishment for those who shall enter into the same, or do any act in performance thereof (8 How. Anno. Stat. [Mich.] 9354), its invalidity is not so clear and free from doubt that a court of first instance would be justified in declaring it void. Mers Capsule Co. v. United States Capsule Co. 67 Fed. 414.

Where several corporations engaged in the same business make a contract, each with the other, to transfer their entire property and business to a new corporation to be organized for the purpose of controlling the prices of the article manufactured by all of the contracting corporations, and each of the latter abandons its business as a proprietor thereof, and becomes practically a mere employee of the new corporation and subject to its dominion and control, such combination is unlawful and void under the provisions of the Michigan statute of 1889, which declares certain contracts and combinations unlawful. And where the new company thus organized attempts to hold one of the contracting corporations to such agreement against its will, and to take possession of its plant and business, an injunction against its doing so will be sustained. Ibid.

Where a corporation agreed to sell its whole output of salt, and its president, by whom the agreement to that effect was made, knew that the defendant corporation controlled the market, and its character of business, which was unlawful, and to which similar contracts were necessary, and to the furthering of which they were adapted; and there was abundant evidence that the officers of the first-named corporation understood this, and were willing to lend themselves to the furtherance of the scheme,—the company first mentioned cannot maintain an action against the other for a fulfillment of the contract, the same being void under § 11,377. Comp. Laws, which declares illegal all contracts, agreements, understandings, and combinations entered into, or knowingly assented to, the purpose, object, or intent of which shall be to limit, control, or in any manner to restrict or regulate, the amount of production, or the quan-

by reason of a combination forbidden by the act of July 2, 1890, chap. 647 (26 Stat. at L. 209 [U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3200]), known as the "anti-trust act," and its right to recovery depends wholly upon the 7th section of that law.

It is true that plaintiff is a municipal corporation. Nevertheless it was maintaining a system of waterworks, and furnished water to consumers, charging for same precisely as would a private corporation engaged in a like business. That a municipal corporation may be empowered to engage in the business of furnishing water or gas, or in the operation of street railways, as well as many other quasi public occupations, must be conceded. That the profit resulting inures to the public does not alter the fact that when thus engaged it is pro hoc vice a business corporation. If its "business" as a corporation engaged in the occupation of supplying water for a consideration has been injured by the unlawful combination complained of, it is just as much entitled to maintain this suit as a private corporation engaged in a like occupation. That it was not engaged in an interstate water business is true. But if it has no standing to recover damages for an injury to its "business," it is not easy to see how it has any better standing to recover for an injury to its "property." That there was evidence tending to show that the plaintiff had been compelled to pay an unreasonable price for the pipe which it bought during the continuance of the unlawful combination complained of is not to be disputed. That its purchases were made exclusively from the Anniston Pipe Company, a corporation doing business in Alabama, and that it is not suing that corporation, is of no vital significance. The Alabama company and the two Tennessee companies which are sued were members of an association which intity of any article to be raised, or to enhance, control, or regulate the market price thereof, or in any manner to prevent or restrict free competition in the production or sale of any such article. Detroit Salt Co. v. National Salt Co. (Mich.) 10 Det. L. N. 366, 96 N. W. 1.

Anno. Stat.), as, by the terms of the contract, the purchasers were restrained from purchasing lambs in the two counties therein mentioned, and the contract had the effect thus to restrict free competition in those counties, and falls within the very terms of the statute. *Bingham v. j. Minnesota.

The constitution and by-laws of a corporation regulated the credit to be allowed to its members, discriminated in the price to be paid for produce against persons not members, controlled the delivery of goods, and provided a penalty by fine and suspension for offending and defaulting members. It was held that such an organization is a combination in restraint of trade, tends to limit and control the market price of produce, limits and interferes with the free and open purchase of commodities, and is 64 L. prohibited by chap. 359, Gen. Laws 1899; and the facts that a dealer in produce was a member of such an association, and participated in the adoption of such constitution and by-laws, do not prevent him from maintaining an action against such association and its members for damages caused by the boycotting by them of his business after he was suspended for violation of such by-laws. The acts complained of having been performed after he ceased to be a member, and without his consent, the plaintiff is not in pari delicto. Ertz v. Produce Exch. Co. 82 Minn. 173, 51 L. R. A. 825, 83 Am. St. Rep. 419, 84 N. W. 743.

In Minnesota v. Northern Securities Co. 123 Fed. 692, it was held that the anti-trust law of Minnesota (Laws 1899, p. 487, chap. 359) was substantially in the same language as the Sherman anti-trust law; and that, therefore, under the decisions of the United States Supreme Court, it applied to railroads; and that any combination, contract, or agreement having the effect of preventing competition by fixing rates to be maintained on railroads, was illegal; but that the contract or agreement set forth in Northern Securities Co. v. United States, 193 U. S. 197, 48 L. ed. 679, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 436, supra, III. i, was not in violation of the statute of the state mentioned. It would seem that by the decision in the United States Supreme Court this case was practically overruled.

Where the business of a gaslight company, as disclosed by its articles of incorporation, was that of manufacturing and selling gas, made from coal or other material, to be used for the purpose of lighting a city; and such articles did not authorize the corporation to engage in the business of buying, selling, or dealing in coke, the latter being a by-product,—an agreement by it with a coal company to sell to such company exclusively all the coke produced by it violates no law prohibiting trusts or combinations, as it has the undoubted legal right to dispose of its by-products, and may sell them all to one customer, and is not bound to sell to all who desire to purchase. State ex rel. Berryhill v. St. Paul Gaslight Co. (Minn.) 100 N. W. 216.

cluded practically every pipe manufacturing concern in a situation to compete for the business of the plaintiff. The evidence also tended to show that the object of the combination was to prevent any other producer of such pipe from competing with the Anniston company for plaintiff's business, and that practices were adopted intended to compel it to deal exclusively with the Alabama member of the association, and to pay a price settled by the combination in advance of any bidding. For this privilege the Alabama corporation agreed to pay a large sum into the pool treasury, called a "bonus," which was to be divided among the confederates in agreed proportions. An appearance of competition was to be maintained by bids put in by the other associates, every such bid being higher than the bid to be made by the company, to whom the contract had been assigned. There was to be no chance for any other person to secure a contract with the plaintiff than that member of the combine selected in advance of the open buildings.

Mr. Justice Peckham in Addyston Pipe & Steel Co. v. United States, 175 U. S. 211, 243, 44 L. ed. 136, 20 Sup. Ct. It was to obtain that particular and specific result that the combination was formed, and but for the restriction the resulting high prices for the pipe would not have been obtained. It is useless for the defendants to say that they did not intend to regulate or affect interstate commerce. They intended to make the very combination and agreement which they in

The legislature, by the chapter on trusts and combines, did not intend to debar a person from conducting his own private business according to his own judgment; and so chap. 140, Code 1892, prohibiting such trusts and combines, will not prevent a manufacturer of goods from confining his sales of goods to a single dealer in a certain territory. *Houck v. The anti-trust laws of Mississippi do not apply to the state, or any of its statutory agencies, in making contracts; and, so, where a corporation which was a publisher of school books made a contract with the county superintendent of public education for an exchange, introduction, and permanent supply of school books, by which new books should be exchanged for old ones without regard to the wear of the latter, up to a certain time, and according to certain rates of exchange agreed upon; and, after the expiration of one year, for the remainder of the time for which the contract was made, the price agreed upon was to take effect and control,—the carrying out of such a contract will not be enjoined. *B. l. Missouri.

Previous to the passage of the statute of Missouri providing that any corporation, either domestic or foreign, which should enter into any pool, trust, agreement, confederation, or understanding with any other corporation, person, or association to regulate or fix the price or premium to be paid for insuring property against loss by fire, lightning, or storm, or maintain such price when so fixed, should be deemed and adjudged guilty of a conspiracy to defraud and liable to a penalty, an association of fire underwriters of the state had existed for the purpose of establishing and maintaining rates at which property in the state would be insured, and had in its employ a person to fix and maintain the rates. After the adoption of the statute the association dissolved, but fact did make, and they must be held to have intended (if in such case intention is of the least importance) the necessary and direct result of their agreement."

Undoubtedly it was not competent for the Congress to regulate by legislation commerce which is purely intrastate, and this limitation was recognized in Addyston Pipe & Steel Co. v. United States, where the court said: "In regard to such of these defendants as might reside and carry on business in the same state where the pipe provided for in any particular contract was to be delivered, the sale, transportation, and delivery of the pipe by them under that contract would be a transaction wholly within the state, and the statute would not be applicable to them in that case. They might make any combination they chose with reference to the proposed contract, although it should happen that some nonresident of the state eventually obtained it."

the person mentioned published a book, which he sold to the various insurance companies who were defendants in this proceeding, in which the rates were fixed, and a clerk in his office was made the secretary of a club at a city in the state; and the reports of all the agents doing business in that state were required by the rules of the club to be delivered to him, and he forwarded them to the several defendant companies. If he discovered that an agent had insured at a rate less than stated in the book mentioned, he reported it to the club and the general manager of the company represented by that agent, which resulted in the agent being disciplined. In an information in the nature of a quo warranto by the attorney general the club was held to be a plain, palpable, but bungling, pool, trust, agreement, combination, confederation, and understanding organized to evade the anti-trust laws of Missouri, but wholly insufficient for such a purpose. It was held that what was done was done by the local agents, and all knew it, and their knowledge was the knowledge of their companies and their acts the acts of their companies; and judgment of ouster was rendered forbidding the several different insurance companies from doing business in the state. State ex rel. Crow v. Firemen's Fund Ins. Co. 152 Mo. 1, 45 L. R. A. 363, 52 S. W. 595.

Acts of several competing dealers in the same line of trade, such as selling at a fixed price from which rebates are given in goods or weights, giving notice of coming advances in person, which always follow as announced, securing concessions from the competitors of the right to sell shopworn goods, gathering evidence of sales under price, and abandoning such conduct as soon as legal proceedings are instituted to punish them, shows a combination to fix prices in restraint of trade which is forbidden 64 L. R. A.

The direct intention and effect of the combination were to limit and restrict the right of each of the several companies to compete for business with Atlanta, as well as to enhance the price of the commodity which was the subject of the agreement. We have, then, a direct action by this plaintiff against two of the members of this unlawful combine. That there was no purchase made direct from either of them is of no importance. Their guilt is as great as that of the Alabama corporation from whom the plaintiff did buy its pipe. If the agreement between the defendants and their associates was unlawful and tortious, each is responsible for the torts committed in the course of the illegal combination. These defendants have themselves participated in the benefits resulting from the bonus paid by the Alabama member of the association, and have no ground to complain that they have been alone sued. Stockwell v. United States, 13 by the anti-trust act of Missouri, and will support a writ of quo warranto to oust the defendant corporations from their franchises to do business in the state. State ex rel. Crow v. Armour Packing Co. 173 Mo. 356, 61 L. R. A. 464, 96 Am. St. Rep. 515, 73 S. W. 645.

While questions affecting the right of a corporation to enjoy its franchises, to be a corporation, or its legal entity as such, can only be raised in a direct proceeding to annul or forfeit the grant to which the state granting the charter is a party, for the reason that, as to third parties, the legality of the corporation is avouched by its charter from the state, which reserves to itself the power to withdraw the franchises bestowed upon evidence of fraudulent obtention or subsequent abuse,—the existence of this rule of procedure cannot deprive the legislature of the power of enacting that inquiries affecting the validity of the charter of a corporation may be made in other proceedings than by an action in the name of the state; and this is just what was done when the anti-trust act became the law of the state. National Lead Co. v. S. E. Grote Paint Store Co. 80 Mo. App. 247.

Where the provisions of an anti-trust act permit a violation of any of its provisions to be pleaded by a private person in a suit against him for the price of goods purchased of a corporation transacting business contrary to such act, it must follow that the right to plead such a defense entitles the party so authorized to prove what he has pleaded, and evidence tending to prove the real objects of the incorporation of the plaintiff and the nature of the business conducted by it is competent, under the express statutory authority given to the defendant, to plead illegality in the incorporation or business transacted by plaintiff as a ground for the release from the indebtedness sued upon. Ibid.

An injunction will not be granted to restrain an association which is a combination in defiance of and under the condemnation of the anti-trust law of the state from expelling the plaintiff in the action from his position as a member. In such an action the plaintiff is in the attitude of asking the court to keep him where the law says he has no right to be, and Replying to the argument that if the combination did not prevent any particular contract that it had not restrained trade, Justice Peckham, in Addyston Pipe & Steel Co. v. United States, 175 U. S. 245, 44 L. ed. 136, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 109, said: "It is not material that the combination did not prevent the letting of any particular contract. Such was not its purpose. On the contrary, the more contracts to be let, the better for the combination. It was formed, not for the object of preventing the letting of contracts, but to restrain the parties to it from competing for contracts, and thereby to enhance the prices to be obtained for the pipe dealt in by those parties. . . . The question is as to the effect of such combination upon the trade in the article; and if that effect be to destroy competition, and thus advance the price, the combination is one in restraint of trade."

If, then, the price of a commodity which is the subject of an interstate contract be unlawfully enhanced by a combination for the purpose of suppressing competition, shall the vendee thus compelled to pay this unlawfully enhanced price be without remedy against the combination because he may happen not to be engaged in the conduct of an interstate business? If the effect of a combination to enhance the price of a commodity which is the subject of interstate commerce be to restrain such commerce, within the meaning of the law of Congress, by reason of its tendency to affect the volume of such trade, then the effect upon the business of one who has paid the enhanced price, in an interstate transaction, must be to correspondingly affect the volume of profit of that business. to maintain him in a position where he may aid in the support and maintenance of an illegal association, and where he may continue to support and keep up a monopoly of the services of the members thereof. Froelich v. Musicians' Mut. Ben. Assn. 93 Mo. App. 383.

A contract or agreement between several brewery corporations of a city that they will not sell to anyone who is in debt for beer to either of the others until he pays that debt is in violation of the statute of Missouri in relation to pools, trusts, and conspiracies, as it tends to lessen full and free competition in the importation, manufacturing, or sale of their production. Ferd Helm Brewing Co. v. Belinder, 97 Mo. App. 64, 71 S. W. 691. In this case the court said that the question is, What is the tendency of the agreement? It does not affect the character of the agreement proved, that the brewers only intended a worthy purpose. Intention will not avail when the effect is within the statute. And it has been held by the highest authority that, though no imposition was consummated by the raising of prices; and even though the agreement was necessary to curb unjust or ill-advised competition,—yet, if the effect of the agreement was within the prohibition of the law, it was void.

And the reason given for holding that the brewers had no right to combine to refuse to sell to one who was indebted to one of their number, was that, while it is true that one has a right to refuse to sell to whomsoever he may elect, that very rule, properly applied, was disastrous to the claim that the combination was not unlawful, as anyone may exercise a choice as to whom he will sell his goods, but he cannot enter into a contract whereby he binds himself not to sell, for in such instance he barter away his right of choice, and destroys the very right he claims the privilege of exercising; and, after entering upon such agreement, he is no longer a free agent. Ibid.

Where an association of master plumbers of a city entered into an agreement with manufacturers of and dealers in goods used by them, whereby it was agreed that such manufacturers and dealers would not sell to a plumber who was not a member of such association, and the association agreed that its members would not purchase of a manufacturer or dealer who sold to any other than a member of the association, an action will lie to dissolve such illegal agreement and combination, and for an injunction to restrain the manufacturers and dealers from enforcing an agreement against a plumber who was not a member of the association by refusing to sell their goods to him. Walsh v. Association of Master Plumbers, 97 Mo. App. 290, 71 S. W. 455.

Where the statute of a state makes it unlawful for any railroad company to own, operate, or manage any parallel or competing railroad in the state, the acquiring by one of two railroads of the stock of another, where the two roads do not touch at any two common points, and for 40 miles another railroad is located between them, and it appears that the business of one, except to a slight extent, would not pass over the other, does not violate such statute, as the two roads are not competing lines within its meaning. Kimball v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 46 Fed. 888.

Where a corporation had absorbed by purchase the larger part of the business of manufacturing and selling cigarettes and smoking tobacco in the United States, which thereafter, by forcing down the market by means of its superior wealth, acquired by purchase 66 per cent of the business of manufacturing and selling plug tobacco, and in doing so purchased the business of three different manufacturing establishments of that product in the state of Missouri, and thereafter sold to another corporation organized for the purpose of receiving from the first-named corporation the sale of the business plants theretofore engaged in the manufacture and sale of plug tobacco theretofore purchased by it, including the three Missouri concerns; and the purchasing corporation thereafter operated the said three Missouri plants (each being a separate corporation) for its own interest, but each in its own original corporate name,—such a transaction was not difference between what he was thus compelled to pay and the reasonable price of the commodity under natural competitive conditions would be an injury to that business directly resulting from such unlawful combination. The injury to his business, whether it be in its volume or profit, is the same whether that business be inter or intra state,—whether he buy to extend his plant, or to sell again in an interstate business. This excessive price is the expected and intended result of the unlawful combination to restrain interstate trade in that commodity. That such a plaintiff is entitled to recover the damages thus sustained in his business, whatever its character, would seem to be the plain purpose of the 7th section of the law of Congress, under the logic of the decision in Addyston Pipe & Steel Co. v. United States. It is possible to so construe this 7th section as to devitalize this section by confining compensatory relief to such persons as shall sustain an injury in some interstate business whose volume or profit has been diminished. But this construction does not seem consistent with the wide economic purposes of Congress, as manifested by the whole tenor of the act. Congress evidently foresaw the wholesome effect of pecuniary responsibility for injuries resulting from such forbidden combinations, and the courts should not devitalize the remedy by strained interpretations calculated to encourage disregard of the law. The act gives the remedy to "any person" "injured in his business or property by any other person or corporation by reason of anything forbidden or declared to be unlawful by this act." If Congress had the power to declare unlawful a combination which was intended to restrain interstate commerce by enhancing the value of a commodity when the subject of interstate commerce, it had the power to give a compen-in violation of the act of 1897, p. 208, § 1, which provides that any corporation which shall create, enter into, or become a member of, any pool, trust, combination, or understanding with any other corporation to fix the price of any manufactured article, merchandise, commodity, etc., shall be guilty of conspiracy, where such last sale was made for a cash consideration and in good faith. State ex rel. Crow v. Continental Tobacco Co. 177 Mo. 1, 75 S. W. 737.

m. Montana.

A private citizen is not authorized to present, through the medium of a civil action, and try, the issue whether a corporation is doing business in violation of a law. A determination of this issue as an independent ground of relief must be had, if at all, by the state, and in its own behalf, through the attorney general; and the question whether such corporation is engaged in doing business in violation of law, and is a monopoly and subject to the prohibition contained in § 20 of art. 15 of the Constitution and the penalties provided by § 321 of the Penal Code, can only be inquired into in that way. McGinniss v. Boston & M. Consol. Copper & Silver Mtn. Co. (Mont.) 75 Pac. 89.

But, so far as the participation of a Montana corporation and its officers in an unlawful combination to create a monopoly subjects its property and franchises to forfeiture, and thus imperils the property rights of a minority stockholder, he has a cause of complaint against it and them, and may, through the medium of a court of equity, compel it and them to abandon such unlawful connection and return to a performance of their obligations under the charter contract of the company. Ibid.

Still not every act of a corporation, though unlawful, will give a minority stockholder therein a right of action against it. So far as he is not injuriously affected, directly or indirectly, he has no ground of complaint, and, until it makes such connection, or pursues such a course, as to make it amenable to the law, he cannot be heard to question its action. Ibid.

The court in the above case admitted that it was held by many courts that the mere possession of power by a combination of corporations, or associations, or persons, injuriously to repress competition, regulate production, and fix prices is against public policy, and all such combinations are by them declared illegal as against public policy; and said that this would be found true of the Illinois supreme court by an examination of HARDING v. AMERICAN GLUCOSE Co.; and said that that case was typical of the class which held to this doctrine. "But," said the court, "an examination of them will reveal the fact that, in each particular case before the court for consideration, it appeared, either from the facts proved or admitted, or from the contract itself, that the defendants entertained and were pursuing the unlawful purpose."

n. Nebraska.

An agreement made by the vendors of a laundry establishment with the purchaser thereof that such vendors would not engage in the laundry business in the same city, either for themselves or for any other person, for the period of five years, is not a combination within the meaning of chap. 69 of the Session Laws of 1889, of Nebraska, known as the anti-trust law; and an action may be maintained by such purchaser to prevent the vendor from violating the same. Downing v. Lewis, 56 Neb. 386, 76 N. W. 900.

See cases in supra, III. d; Hitchcock v. Anthony, 28 C. C. A. 80, 54 U. S. App. 439, 83 Fed. 779, supra, IV. i; and cases in infra, IV. v. 3.

Chapter 91a, Comp. Stat. 1901, of Nebraska, entitled Trusts, is not unconstitutional because § 9 expressly excepts organizations of laboring men, for the purpose of raising wages, from its operation, on the ground that special and exclusive privileges and immunities are granted to laborers contrary to § 15, art. 3, of the state Constitution, as no express exception of organizations of laborers, intended to maintain or advance wages, was necessary to exempt them from its operation. The court said: "The section in question is inserted, rather, out of abundance of caution, to prevent judicial extension of the terms of the act beyond its scope and satory remedy to any person directly affected by the unlawful agreement.

We see no application of the case of Connolly v. Union Sewer Pipe Co. 184 U. S. 540, 46 L. ed. 679, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 431, to the case at bar. Undoubtedly the contract of purchase and sale of pipe was a contract wholly collateral to the unlawful trust agreement between the makers of such pipe, and the vendor could make out a case for the purchase price without reliance upon the unlawful agreement between such makers. The contract of bargain and sale between the Anniston Pipe Company and the plaintiff was therefore a valid and enforceable agreement, and the plaintiff could not defend a suit for the price by showing that the seller was a partner in an illegal association. The court in that case did decide that the damages recoverable under the 7th section were recoverable only in a direct action, and could not be set off in a suit under a contract for the price. But this was based, not upon any construction of that section, but upon the general principle of law which forbids the setting off of unliquidated damages not directly growing out of the principal transaction. The present suit is a direct action, and is, therefore, unaffected by anything decided in that case.

This brings us to the question of the limitation applicable to the suit. Under the evidence, it was very plain that plaintiff's right of action accrued more than three and less than five years before action commenced. The anti-trust act provides no limitation, and, if any has been prescribed by Federal law, it is that found in § 1047, Rev. Stat.

purpose, than to grant a privilege or immunity to persons who would otherwise fall within its terms. The distinction between goods and merchandise produced by skill and labor, and the skill and labor which produce them, is manifest and reasonable. The statute does not say that laborers who have goods, wares, or merchandise, the produce of labor, for sale, may combine to advance or control the price, but only that the law designed to prevent combinations in restraint of trade in such articles, when produced, shall not be construed to affect organizations formed to regulate the wages of compensation of the labor and skill which produce them." Cleland v. Anderson (Neb.) 92 N. W. 306.

The anti-trust statute of Nebraska, which makes any combination of capital, skill, or acts by persons with intent to prevent competition, which seeks to fix the price of any article, commodity, use, or merchandise with intent to prevent others in the like business or occupation from conducting the business or occupation, a trust; and which provides that the charter of domestic corporations shall be forfeited and foreign corporations excluded from the state for a violation of its provisions; and which expressly excepts from its provisions assemblies and associations of workmen, and provides that "there is hereby reserved to them all the rights and privileges now accorded them by law,"—is unconstitutional and void as depriving persons of their liberty in violation of the Federal Constitution, which includes the liberty to make and enforce contracts, which is an institutional and fundamental right of the citizen of the United States; and also for the reason that it excepts labor organizations from its provisions, and thereby denies the equal protection of the laws to all persons. Niagara Fire Ins. Co. v. Cornell, 110 Fed. 816.

c. New Hampshire.

The first act in the nature of an anti-trust law which seems to appear in the reports of this country is the statute of New Hampshire of July 5, 1867, chap. 8, which provides "that two or more railroad corporations chartered by the legislature of this state constituting the whole or part of different lines of route for public travel and transportation between any two cities or towns, or between any city and town either within or without this state, forming rival and competing lines of route between such points, shall not be allowed to consolidate such roads or lines; and neither of said lines, or any road or roads composing the same, shall be run or operated by any such rival and competing line, or any road or roads, or portion thereof, under any business contract, lease, or other arrangement; but each and every railroad corporation so situated shall be run, managed, and operated separately by its own officers and agents, and be dependent for its connection with other roads, and the facilities and accommodations it shall afford the public for travel and transportation under fair and open competition, unless such lease, contract, or arrangement be first authorized by the legislature and approved by the government and council."

The statute further provides for a penalty for its violation, and also that any citizen may apply to the supreme judicial court, or a justice thereof, whose duty it shall be to issue an injunction to restrain such violation.

Under the provisions of this act, it was held in Currier v. Concord R. Corp. 48 N. H. 321, that one having occasion to use the roads so violating the statute, or to purchase articles transported, has such an interest that he may maintain an action for such an injunction, as his interest is not of the character that might be protected by a suit to recover damages.

Under the same statute, it was held in Morrill v. Boston & M. R. Co. 55 N. H. 531, that an arrangement between two railroads, one chartered by the legislature of New Hampshire and the other by the legislature of Massachusetts, but, at the time of the making of the agreement, operating and controlling certain railroads chartered by the legislature of New Hampshire, by the terms of which each of the two railroads should retain 60 per cent of its gross earnings between all competing points on their respective routes and the city of Boston, to pay the running expenses of the respective roads, and the balance of said gross earnings, being 40 per cent thereof, should constitute a committee fund to be divided equally between said roads,—came within the prohibition of the act.

In a proceeding by the attorney general to

(U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 727), which provides that "no suit or prosecution for any penalty or forfeiture, pecuniary or otherwise, accruing under the laws of the United States," shall be maintained unless commenced within five years from accrual of penalty or forfeiture. If this is an action to recover a penalty, within the meaning of this statute, the suit was in time. The shorter statute of the state, limiting the time for the commencement of suits for statutory penalties to one year, would have no application to a suit for a penalty under an act of Congress. It is only when there is no Federal statute that the limitation prescribed by the law of the state is applicable. Campbell v. Haverhill, 155 U. S. 610, 614, 39 L. ed. 280, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 217; Brady

v. Daly, 175 U. S. 148, 44 L. ed. 109, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 62.

We find ourselves in agreement with the court below in holding that an action under the 7th section of the act of July 2, 1890, chap. 647 (26 Stat. at L. 210 [U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3202]), is not a penal action. The three first sections of the act are undoubtedly penal. They forbid certain contracts and combinations, and provide that persons doing any of the forbidden things shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and subject to punishment by both fine and imprisonment. The 4th and 5th sections give jurisdiction to the circuit courts to prevent and restrain violations of the act, and deal with procedure under the restraining power thus granted. The 6th section provides for the forfeiture to the United States of property obtained by the examination of witnesses under the provisions of chap. 383 of the Laws of 1897, it is essential that the petition upon which an application is made to the justice of the supreme court for an order providing for the examination of such witnesses for the purpose of determining whether an action should be commenced under the act which is designed to prevent monopolies in articles or commodities in common use should contain a statement that the testimony desired is material and necessary, and specify the facts and circumstances which show that it is so, as provided by art. 1, title 3, chap. 9, of the Code of Civil Procedure; and the provision of the act mentioned, that the provision of art. 1, above referred to, should apply "so far as practicable," does not obviate the necessity therefore. Re Atty. Gen. 22 App. Div. 285, 47 N. Y. Supp. 883.

The purchase by a gas company of the stocks and bonds of a rival company, at prices greater than their actual market value, payment being made therefor in stocks and bonds of the purchasing company, will not be enjoined at the suit of a stockholder of the latter company as a combination for the creation of a monopoly or in unlawful restraint of trade or the prevention of competition in a necessary of life, contrary to the provisions of § 7 of the stock corporation law, where it appears that the existence and welfare of the purchasing company depend upon such purchase in order to relieve it from competition which is unprofitable to both companies, and it is not shown that the purchasing company does not intend to use the plant or exercise the franchise acquired by the contract of purchase; nor does the agreement amount to a consolidation of the two companies. Rafferty v. Buffalo City Gas Co. 37 App. Div. 618, 56 N. Y. Supp. 288.

In Walsh v. Dwight, 40 App. Div. 513, 58 N. Y. Supp. 91, it appeared that the defendants offered to parties purchasing their goods to make a reduction in the price of the goods sold in consideration of the purchaser's agreeing not to sell the goods at a less price than that named, and not to sell the goods of other manufacturers at a less price than that at which they agreed to sell the defendant's goods, and it was held that such a contract was not within § 1 of chap. 16 of the Laws of 1893, prohibiting combinations to restrain competition. 64 L. R. A.

An organization of coal dealers intended to prevent competition in prices, in pursuance of which the price of coal is raised, is a conspiracy condemned by § 168 of the New York Penal Code making it a misdemeanor to conspire to commit any act injurious to trade or commerce; and raising the price of coal is a sufficient overt act. People v. Sheldon, 139 N. Y. 251, 23 L. R. A. 221, 36 Am. St. Rep. 690, 34 N. E. 785, Affirming 66 Hun, 590, 21 N. Y. Supp. 859.

Proceedings under chap. 690, Laws 1899, relating to the suppression of monopolies, are not limited to combinations in process of formation, but reach those already formed which are still maintained and in process of consummation. Re Davies, 168 N. Y. 89, 56 L. R. A. 855, 61 N. E. 118.

And so the re-enactment, with amendments, of a statute for the suppression of monopolies will not prevent its enforcement against a combination organized before the passage of the new act, but within the life of the prior one. Ibid. (See cases in supra, III. f.)

Nonjudicial duties are not imposed upon a judge by a statute providing that, when the attorney general has determined to commence an action under the statute for the prevention of monopolies, "it shall be the duty" of the judge to grant his application for an order for examination of witnesses; since he must first decide whether or not a case has been made out pursuant to the statute, so that the duty is judicial in form, and the purpose of the statute is to enable the attorney general to prepare his complaint, or to prepare for trial, which is judicial in nature. Ibid.

The constitutional right of liberty and property is not illegally impaired by a statute which requires one to appear before a referee and furnish evidence to aid the attorney general in instituting proceedings for the suppression of a monopoly; and a justice of the supreme court may be authorized by such statute to appoint a referee to take testimony to aid the attorney general in instituting such proceedings. Ibid.

In John D. Park & Sons Co. v. National Wholesale Druggists' Assn. 175 N. Y. 1, 62 L. R. A. 632, 96 Am. St. Rep. 598, 67 N. E. 136, Affirming 54 App. Div. 223, 66 N. Y. Supp. 615, it was held that a plan by a voluntary as-

erty in course of transportation owned by any such unlawful combination, etc. The 7th section alone gives any remedy to one injured by such a forbidden combination or contract, and that measures the relief by the "damages by him sustained," costs of suit, and his reasonable attorneys' fees. The remedy is not given to the public, for no one may bring the action save the person "who shall be injured," etc., and the recovery is for the sole benefit of the person so injured and suing. It is not reasonable to construe the remedy so conferred as a penal action, for that would be to add to the punishment by fine or imprisonment imposed by the other sections of the act an additional punishment by way of pecuniary penalty. The plain intent is to compensate the person injured. True, the compensation is to be three times the damage sustained. But this enlargement of compensation is not enough to constitute the action as penal action, within the meaning of § 1047, Rev.

sociation of merchants engaged in selling proprietary medicines, adopted by manufacturers of them, looking to the maintenance of prices, by which the manufacturers shall sell at fixed prices, with a rebate only to concerns who can be relied on to maintain the selling price, is not void as creating a monopoly or in restraint of trade, nor as against public policy; and that the adoption of a plan for the sale of their product, by manufacturers of proprietary medicines, as proposed by an association of wholesale dealers, which results in a refusal to sell to complainant, is not shown to have been compelled by threats or intimidation, by allegations that the manufacturers were prevented from selling to complainant for the reason that they wished to protect themselves "with the wholesale and jobbing druggists," and that the committee of the association recommended "that continuing and untiring opposition be shown to the sale of those articles of those proprietors who do not adopt" the plan.

No boycott against a merchant is effected by the refusal by the manufacturers of a proprietary medicine, at the instance of a voluntary association of merchants engaged in the same line of business, to give him a rebate from the selling price of the medicines unless he will maintain the price to consumers. Ibid.

No mention is made in the case in the supreme court, or in the prevailing opinions, that the action was brought for a violation of the anti-trust law, but one of the dissenting judges in his opinion, in endeavoring to show that the association, agreement, or combination in the case is unlawful, cited and quoted chap. 383, Laws 1897, and urged that the association in question was a violation of that act, citing numerous state and Federal decisions in support thereof; and the case has been frequently cited by counsel and courts in actions which were based upon Federal and state anti-trust laws, and very recently was referred to at length and distinguished by the same court in STRAUS v. AMERICAN PUBLISHERS' ASSO.

Under the act (chap. 690, Laws 1899) whereby every contract, agreement, arrangement, or combination, whereby a monopoly in the manu-

Stat. (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 727). Thus in Goodridge v. Rogers, 22 Pick. 495, and Adams v. Palmer, 6 Gray, 338, the action was for a tort for entering upon land and committing trespass, and was brought under a statute which gave to the plaintiff three-fold damages. It was, nevertheless, held not to be an action for a statute penalty, so as to bring it under a statute which barred all actions and suits for penalties and forfeitures within one year. In suits for the infringement of patents, judgment for three-fold the actual damages may be rendered; but suits under the statute have never been regarded as penal actions. Campbell v. Haverhill, 155 U. S. 610, 39 L. ed. 280, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 217. In Woodward v. Alston, 12 Heisk. 581, an action against a clerk for fees illegally collected was held not to be a penal action, although called a "penalty" in the statute giving the particular remedy. In Brady v. Daly, 175 U. S. 148, 44 L. ed. 109, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 62, the suit was under facture, production, or sale, in New York, of any article or commodity of common use is or may be created, established, or maintained. is declared to be against public policy, illegal, and void, it makes no difference whether such acts, if done by an individual not in the combination, might have been lawful, and a person suffering therefrom would be remediless; and the right of action given by the same statute is so given for the reason that the acts done by agreement or combination of several are made unlawful in an association whose aim is to commit a statutory crime. Nothing may be done in furtherance of the purpose for which it has combined. Every act is unlawful, and for that reason a right of action accrues to each person who suffers an injury. Rourke v. Elk Drug Co. 75 App. Div. 145, 77 N. Y. Supp. 373.

And so, where a complaint charged the defendants with forming a combination among themselves and with others for the unlawful purpose of preventing the free pursuit of a lawful business, of increasing the price of commodities in common use, and of preventing the competition in trade in certain articles, all of which things were expressly prohibited by statute and made a misdemeanor, it was held to state a cause of action, and a demurrer thereto was overruled. Ibid.

q. North Carolina.

The act of the general assembly of North Carolina (Act 1903, p. 1074, chap. 697), amendatory of § 3122 of the Code, providing who may legally practise medicine and surgery, which provides that, for the purpose of that act, the expression (practice of medicine and surgery) shall be construed to mean the management, for fee or reward, of any disease, physical or mental, real or imaginary, with or without drugs, surgical operation, surgical or mechanical appliances, or by any other method whatsoever; provided that the same shall not apply to midwives, nurses, or any person who ministers to or cures the sick or suffering by prayer to Almighty God without the use of any drug or medical means,—is violative of § 31, § 4966, Rev. Stat. (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3415), providing that one publicly presenting a copyrighted dramatic performance, without the owner's consent, shall be liable for all damages, "to be assessed at such sum, not less than one hundred dollars for the first, and fifty dollars for every subsequent performance as to the court shall appear to be just." The suit was held not to be a suit for the recovery of a penalty or forfeiture.

The whole subject of penal and compensatory actions has been so thoroughly considered in Huntington v. Attrill, 146 U. S. 657, 36 L. ed. 1123, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 224, and Brady v. Daly, 175 U. S. 148, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 62, 44 L. ed. 109, as well as by the very full and able opinion of Judge Clark in the court below in disposing of a demurrer to a plea, that we feel we can add nothing to the subject.

The limitation applied by the court below was that prescribed by § 4470, Shannon's

Revision, Tenn. Code. Prior to the Tennessee Code of 1858 the statute of limitations operated upon the remedy, and applied to the form of action. By the Code then adopted, and its amendments, the limitation now applies to the cause of action. Kirkman v. Philips, 7 Heisk. 222; Callaway v. McMillian, 11 Heisk. 557. The limitations of actions other than real are found in §§ 4466 to 4483 inclusive, Shannon's Code. Section 4466 provides that "all civil actions, other than those for causes embraced in the foregoing article, shall be commenced after the cause of action has accrued, within the periods prescribed in this chapter, unless otherwise expressly provided."

Section 4469, among other things, prescribes that actions for "statute penalties" shall be brought within one year.

Sections 4470, 4472, and 4473 must come under consideration, and are here below set out in full:

"Sec. 4470. Actions for injuries to per-art. 1, of the Constitution, prohibiting monopolies. State v. Biggs, 133 N. C. 729, 64 L. R. A. 139, 46 S. E. 401.

T. Ohio.

The act 93 Ohio Laws, 143, while originally and primarily intended to suppress and control what are known as trusts and monopolies, is still so comprehensive and far reaching in its express terms as to extend to every combination by two or more individuals, by their capital, skill, or acts, to create or carry on any restriction in trade or commerce; the boycott is undoubtedly such a combination by individuals for the purpose of creating and carrying out a restriction in trade. State v. Jacobs, 7 Ohio N. P. 261.

And so a combination by two or more persons for the purpose of boycotting a third person is a combination to create and carry out a restriction in trade and commerce, and is a violation of 93 Ohio Laws, 143. Ibid.

A contract in which a business is abandoned, and the good will as well as personal services transferred, is not a contract or combination solely for the purpose of restraining competition and maintaining prices, so as to be under the condemnation of the Ohio anti-trust law (93 Ohio Laws, 143). Kevil v. Standard Oil Co. 8 Ohio N. P. 811.

An indictment which charges that on a certain day the defendant was an active member of, acted with and in pursuance of, aided and assisted in carrying out the purposes of, a coal exchange, an association of persons organized for the purpose of preventing competition in the sale, and to maintain a uniform and graduated figure for the sale of coal, and directly to preclude a free and unrestricted competition among the members of said association, purchasers, and consumers in the sale and transportation of coal, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided,—falls to allege facts sufficient to constitute a crime under the act of April 19, 1898 (93 Ohio Laws, 143). Gage v. State, 24 Ohio C. C. 724. 64 L. R. A.

a. Oregon.

A rule promulgated by a board of commissioners for licensing sailors' boarding houses, by which licenses were to be issued to the keepers of such houses who could secure recommendations from persons engaged in shipping at the port, tends to create a monopoly of the business, for the shippers, by concerted action, could secure the appointment of only one person or firm, thereby excluding all competition. Whether or not such a mode of issuing licenses would advance the interest of shippers, or promote the public good, makes no difference, for the board of commissioners for licensing sailors' boarding houses can exercise no greater power than was possessed by the legislative assembly; and, as that body could not create a monopoly of a legitimate business in which every person can engage of common right, without contravening art. 1 of § 20 of the Constitution, a fortiori its creatures, the board, are, likewise, prohibited from doing so. White v. Holman (Or.) 74 Pac. 933.

t. South Carolina.

The act of 1894 (21 Stat. at L. 812), providing that no corporation, individual, or association, or either or both, shall purchase or lease any railroad lying in whole or in part within the state, or any interest therein, or shall operate the same where such purchaser or lessee already owns, operates, or is interested in, a line or lines of railroad which, either alone or in conjunction with other connecting railroads lying within or without the state, can compete between any two or more points within the state; and any such purchase, lease, or acquisition is declared to be null and void,—was not repealed by the Constitution of 1895, § 8, of art. 9; and so the act of 1897 (22 Stat. at L. 497), providing that any railroad company owning, leasing, or operating competing railroad lines within the state in violation of law shall be subject to a penalty, should be construed in connection with the act of 1894, defining competing railroad lines; and a complaint under the act of 1897, as defined by the sonal or real property; actions for the detention or conversion of personal property within three years from the accruing of the cause of action."

"Sec. 4472. Actions for the use and occupation of land and for rent; actions against the sureties of guardians, executors, and administrators, sheriffs, clerks, and other public officers, for nonfeasance, misfeasance, and malfeasance in office; actions on contracts not otherwise expressly provided for, within six years after the cause of action accrued.

"Sec. 4473. Actions against guardians, executors, administrators, sheriffs, clerks, and other public officers on their bonds, actions on judgments, and decrees of courts of record of this or any other state or government, and all other cases not expressly provided for, within ten years after the cause of action accrued."

The learned trial judge held this action to be one for an injury to property, within act of 1894, is not demurrable for not stating a good cause of action against a railroad for operating competing lines. Edwards v. Southern R. Co. 66 S. C. 277, 44 S. E. 748.

U. Tennessee.

An agreement between the stockholders of two manufacturing corporations, one of which was composed of three stockholders and the other of five, that the output of the two mills of both corporations should be put into the hands of a third or selling corporation, which was to put the goods upon the markets of the world at one price,—that is, in its hands they were intermingled and sold as the goods of one owner,—was a hard and fast agreement, shutting off competition between the two original corporations. In an action by the new corporation, in the nature of a creditor's suit, to reach the property of one of the original corporations (which had become insolvent), on a claim for money advanced to it, it was held that the complainant could not assert such claim as against other creditors of the insolvent corporation, since the combination was unlawful as tending to prevent competition under Acts 1891, chap. 218, § 1. American Handle Co. v. Standard Handle Co. (Tenn. Ch. App.) 59 S. W. 709.

The legal right of each individual plumber to purchase supplies and materials from any dealer or dealers he may choose will not justify a by-law of an association of plumbers which permits them to make purchases only from such dealers as will sell to members thereof exclusively, as the individual right is radically different from the binding action, the former being freedom, the latter restraint, and is violative of the statutes (Shannon's Code, §§ 3185, 3622), which forbid and declare unlawful, null, and void all trusts, pools, contracts, arrangements, or combinations, or corners, or other devices that are intended to destroy or prevent, or that have a tendency to destroy or prevent, full and free competition in the production, manufacture, or sale of any article of legitimate traffic, or that are designed or tend to fix, regulate, limit, reduce, or increase the price of such article, or 64 L. R. A.

the meaning of § 4470, and therefore barred in three years. To this we cannot assent. That section plainly applies only to causes of action arising out of some injury to property, as distinguished from its detention or conversion. Property, either personal or real, may be injured or damaged without its being either detained or converted. But whether the cause of action be an injury or damage to the property, or for its taking or detention, the suit must be brought within the same period. This distinction between the two kinds of injury to tangible personal property is of very ancient origin. Sir William Blackstone (vol. 3, 145, 153), in his chapter entitled Of Injuries to Personal Property, says: "The rights of personal property in possession are liable to two species of injuries,—the amotion or deprivation of that possession, and the abuse or damage of the chattels, while the possession continues in the legal owner. The former, or deprivation of possession, is also divisible to create a monopoly or a corner therein, or that may in any manner injuriously affect the legitimate trade and commerce of the country. Bailey v. Master Plumbers' Assn. 108 Tenn. 99, 46 L. R. A. 561, 52 S. W. 853.

V. Texas.

1. General rule.

Where a railroad is chartered under the laws of the United States, and granted land under the laws of the state, in both of which it is forbidden to discriminate against any connecting or intersecting road,—and the state laws forbid it to enter into any combination in the nature of a partnership with any other railroad of the state running parallel with it or in the same direction, that will give the other road control of rates on it, as a condition of such land grant, a combination by the receivers of the road, or its successor, with another railroad having 200 miles of track parallel to the former, relating to business interchanged in the state, and giving such other road a preference in rates, is violative of both the United States and state statutes; and, upon objection being made by other railroad corporations whose business is interfered with, such pooling and traffic arrangements will be abrogated, although the receivers of the first-mentioned road are willing to make an arrangement with the objecting companies, and the arrangement is satisfactory to the traffic agents of the objecting companies, and is for the benefit of the property of the first-mentioned railroad in the hands of the receiver. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Texas & P. R. Co. 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 428, 30 Fed. 2.

In Texas & P. Coal Co. v. Lawson, 89 Tex. 394, 32 S. W. 871, 34 S. W. 919, the question was whether a contract between a coal company, the owner of a large quantity of land, employing several hundred miners and owning various buildings designed for various purposes, among them a saloon, with a person, whereby the company leased to such person its saloon and connecting buildings for a term of years with the privilege of renewal, and obligated itself into two branches,—the unjust and unlawful taking them away, and the unjust detaining them, though the original taking might be lawful.”

Touching injuries to property, as distinguished from its taking or detention, the same author says: “As to the damage that may be offered to things personal while in the possession of the owner, as hunting a man's deer, shooting his dogs, poisoning his cattle, or in any wise taking from the value of any of his chattels, or making them in a worse condition than before, these are injuries too obvious to need explication. I have only, therefore, to mention the remedies given by the law to redress them, which are in two shapes: By action of trespass vi et armis, where the act is in itself immediately injurious to another's property, and therefore necessarily accompanied with some degree of force; and by special action on the case, where the act is in itself indifferent, and the injury only consequential, and therefore arising without any breach of the peace. In both of which suits the plaintiff shall recover damages in proportion to the injury which he proves that his property has sustained. And it is not material whether the damage be done by the defendant himself, or his servants by his direction, for the action will lie against the master as well as the servant. And if a man keeps a dog or other brute animal used to do mischief, as by worrying sheep or the like, the owner must answer for the consequences, if he knows of such evil habit.”

We find in the very carefully selected verbiage of § 4470 a recognition of the two kinds of injury to which tangible property is susceptible,—one by a damage which does not affect the possession, and the other by a taking or detention which does.

While the precise question has not been decided by the supreme court of Tennessee, we do find an indisposition to give to the section any such broad and indeterminate to the effect that it would not, during the continuance of such lease, sell, or permit any other person or persons other than the lessee to sell, any wine, beer, or spirituous liquors upon any lands owned or occupied by said company during the term of said lease; and that the company should during said lease “issue checks to all persons in its employ to whom money may be due for wages or labor performed, and redeem weekly all checks so issued which said Lawson [the lessee] may receive for wines, beers, or spirituous liquors sold by him.”—was void as a matter of law, as being an undue restraint upon trade, or as tending and intended to create and foster a monopoly, or as being a trust within the statute which inhibits a “combination of capital and acts;” and it was held that it was.

In an action against an insurance company by a firm manufacturing bagging, the refusal of an instruction by the court that, if there was a trust or combine between bagging manufacturers, of which the manufacturing company to whom the loss under the policy, if any, was by the terms thereof payable, was one, to regulate the prices of bagging in the state of Texas, and one of the plaintiffs knew of it, the jury should find for the defendant,—is not error, as the owner of bagging may insure although he may be a member of a trust for the purpose of controlling the price of bagging. Springfield F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Cannon (Tex. Civ. App.) 46 S. W. 375.

A combination or conspiracy between two electric street railway companies, one person being the president of both, and each engaged in producing electricity as a motive power and as a commodity and merchandise at a certain city, and an electric light company and a gas company, engaged in manufacturing, producing, and vending gas and electricity in the same city, to the effect that none of said companies interested in the production of electricity in said city should make any bids upon public lighting of the city bids for which were about to be renewed, and that said railway companies and electric companies should be consolidated; that all of said corporations should apply to the city council for an extension for a long period of years of their rights, privileges, and franchises theretofore granted to them and then existing, to the end that all the interests of said corporations might be pooled, united, combined, and consolidated in one common management and for one purpose, to wit, the control of the production and price of said commodities, electricity, and gas for lighting and motive power; that the two street railway companies should charge passengers a certain price and no less; that the proposition to the city council should contain a provision that all of the rights, etc., to be so obtained should be assignable; that none of the corporations other than the electric light company should, for a term of years, bid upon the contract for the public electric lights of the city; and that the gas company should have, without competition from the other corporations, the privileges of furnishing and vending gas to the inhabitants of the city,—was held to be in violation of the anti-trust act (Rev. Stat. art. 5318); and, in an action of quo warranto, instituted by the attorney general against the gas company for the purpose of forfeiting its charter on the ground of the violation of said statute, judgment of ouster was rendered and affirmed by the court of appeals. San Antonio Gas Co. v. State, 22 Tex. Civ. App. 118, 54 S. W. 289.

The anti-trust statute of Texas (act May 25, 1899, § 12), providing for the recovery back of money paid to members of pools, trusts, and monopolies, does not authorize an action against a corporation or company unlawfully transacting business in violation of that statute, and members of its board of directors, for money thus paid to it, where the corporation has ceased to exist; as the provision is for a penalty, and not for liquidated damages, and a cause of action does not survive the existence of the corporation. Mason v. Adoue, 30 Tex. Civ. App. 276, 70 S. W. 347.

A combination of insurance companies to establish uniform rates of insurance and of agent's commissions is not illegal under the Texas anti-trust law of March 30, 1889, prohibiting trusts meaning as would include a suit which does not involve any actual injury to property. Thus this section was held not to apply to a suit against an attorney for the negligent loss of a debt intrusted to him for collection (Bruce v. Baxter, 7 Lea, 477; Ramsay v. Temple, 3 Lea, 253); nor to the suit of a stockholder, in behalf of the corporation, against bank directors, for the negligent discharge of their duties, by which the corporation had sustained losses (Wallace v. Lincoln Sav. Bank, 89 Tenn. 631, 24 Am. St. Rep. 625, 15 S. W. 448).

In Kirkman v. Philips, 7 Heisk. 222, 225, the court said: "The statute of limitations applicable depends upon the nature and character of the action, and not upon its form." In the same case it was held that, although the forms of action have been abolished by the Code, an owner of personal property, whose right to sue for damages for its conversion was barred by the statute of three years, might waive the tort, and sue for the value upon the implied assumpsit, in which case his suit would not be barred in six years: that being the time within which a suit upon a contract might be brought. See also Alsbrook v. Hathaway, 3 Sneed, 454. Actions on statute liabilities, not being a statute penalty, and not dependent upon any contract, express or implied, are actions not otherwise "expressly provided for by any of the other sections of the chapter upon the limitations of actions other than real." Such an action is at the common law,—one in the nature of an action upon a specialty,—and is of a similar kind to those enumerated in § 4473, Shannon's Code. Under the statute of 21 James I., chap. 16, all actions "upon the case," with certain exceptions, and "all actions of debt grounded upon any lending or contract without specialty," were barred unless commenced within the time named in the statute. But an action of debt which was grounded upon a specialty was not within the statute. Specialties were not within the evil intended. Angell, Limitations of Actions, § 80; Jones v. Pope, 1 Saund. 38; White v. Parkin, 12 East, 578, 11 Revised Rep. 488; Browne, Actions at Law, 345; Bullard v. Bell, 1 Mason, 243, Fed. Cas. No. 2,121; 4 Bacon, Abr. 471. But the statute of James operated upon the form of action. Thus, all actions "upon the case," whatever the cause of action, were within the bar of the statute, and so were "all actions of debt grounded upon any lending or contract without specialty."

In Carrol v. Green, 92 U. S. 509, 23 L. ed. 738, it was held that a suit by creditors of a corporation to enforce their claims against stockholders under a clause of the charter rendering them individually liable was for restrictions in trade, or the production of price, or rates of transportation for commodities or articles of commerce; since a contract of insurance is not "trade," nor is it "an article of commerce" or a "commodity." Queen Ins. Co. v. State, 86 Tex. 250, 22 L. R. A. 483, 24 S. W. 397.

See Beechley v. Mulville, 102 Iowa, 602, 63 Am. St. Rep. 479, 70 N. W. 107, 71 N. W. 428, supra, IV. f; Etna Ins. Co. v. Com. 106 Ky. 864, 45 L. R. A. 355, 51 S. W. 624, supra, IV. h.

The words "restrictions in trade," in an anti-trust law making such restrictions a felony punishable by fine or imprisonment, cannot be construed to include all contracts which in any sense restrict trade, but are limited to combinations such as those between producers or dealers to limit the production or supply of an article, and thus acquire a monopoly of it, and then unreasonably enhance prices, or those quasi public corporations which might be disabled by the combination from performing a duty to the public. Queen Ins. Co. v. State, 86 Tex. 250, 22 L. R. A. 483, 24 S. W. 397.

Where all the liquor dealers in a city unite in a contract to control the beer trade in such city and in the tributary markets, each party to the contract turning all the beer he or they may handle into the trust, such a contract is a violation of the act of 1890, relating to conspiracies against trade, which denounces as an offense a combination of capital, skill, or acts by two or more persons, firms, corporations, or associations of persons for the purpose of preventing competition in the sale of any article of commerce, as the agreement in question possessed this feature. Anheuser-Busch Brewing Asso. v. Houck (Tex. Civ. App.) 27 S. W. 692, Affirmed in 88 Tex. 184, 30 S. W. 869.

Where beer and ice were sold by a brewing company, a Texas corporation, to a firm under a written contract whereby the brewing company agreed to give to the firm the sole representation and sale of its products in a town and vicinity at certain prices, and the firm agreed, among other things, during the term of the contract to handle no other beer than that of the brewing company, except with its express permission, such a contract is one of sale, and not one which merely establishes the dealer as the agent of the company; and is a combination in restraint of trade, and under the condemnation of the statute of March 30, 1889. Texas Brewing Co. v. Templeman, 90 Tex. 277, 38 S. W. 27.

And in Fuqua v. Pabst Brewing Co. 90 Tex. 298, 35 L. R. A. 241, 38 S. W. 29, 750, it was held that a contract not to sell, or be interested in the sale of, any beer except that of one company, which in turn agrees not to sell or consign beer to any other party in the vicinity, is a combination of the capital and acts of the parties which constitutes a trust, in violation of the Texas statute of March 30, 1889.

And so beer brought from another state under an invalid trust agreement becomes, upon its arrival in the state, immediately subject to the anti-trust law of the state by virtue of the act of Congress of August 8, 1890. Ibid.

And a contract by the terms of which one party obligated itself that no beer should be represented or held for sale by it other than that furnished by or with the consent of a brewing company which company in turn obli-barred by the South Carolina statute; being, in substance, the act of 21 James I., chap. 16. The reason given for this result was that the charter was a mere offer or proposal by the state, which the stockholders could accept or reject, and that, by taking stock, they assented to the liability imposed, and that the assent thus given and promise implied was the ground of liability, and that the action of case would lie upon such an implied promise, which action was within the bar of the statute. The court, however, went further, and held that the action or suit was not on the statute, and was, therefore, not an action on a specialty. "The statute," said the court, "was only inducement. The implied promise of the stockholders to fulfil its requirements was the agreement on their part, and it was without specialty." The distinctions made in the case are quite refined, and turn upon common-law forms of action. So far as the case goes upon the ground that the charter involved a mere proposal, and that the liability of the shareholder was grounded upon his implied agreement, it is in accord with the great current of authority.

The statute of James, as amended by act N. C. 1715, chap. 21, was in force in Tennessee until adoption of the Tennessee Code of 1858. N. C. Act 1715, chap. 31, Scott's Revisal, vol. 1; Pea v. Waggoner, 5 Hayw. (Tenn.) 19; Tisdale v. Munroe, 3 Yerg. 320. By the Code, the statutes no longer operate upon the form, but upon the cause, of action; and, by § 4473, every cause of action not otherwise expressly provided for is barred, without regard to whether it be upon a specialty or not.

It is impossible, having any regard to the verity of things, to conceive how any action would lie, under the 7th section of the anti-trust act, upon any implied agreement of the defendants to compensate the plaintiff for the injury to its business and property. But if we could torture an implied agreement out of the transaction, the defendants would not be in better plight, for, if the cause of action be a contract, express or implied, the action would not be barred for six years. Shannon's Code, § 4472. We are, however, of opinion that this is an action on a statute liability, and that the cause of action does not arise out of any agreement, and that such an action is not barred for ten years.

The third and fourth pleas were bad, and the demurrer to them should have been sustained. The direction to find a verdict for the defendants was also error.

The judgment will be reversed, with directions to grant a new trial.

gated itself not to sell beer at two certain places where the other party was engaged in business, other than through such party, during the term of the contract, is a contract of sale, and not of agency, and is violative of Rev. Stat. 1895, art. 5313, avoiding contracts which restrain trade, or prevent competition in the sale of various commodities. Texas Brewing Co. v. Anderson (Tex. Civ. App.) 40 S. W. 737; Texas Brewing Co. v. Durrum (Tex. Civ. App.) 46 S. W. 880.

In Vandeweghe v. American Brewing Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 61 S. W. 526, the court said: "This is a suit on a contract for the sale of beer. The only defense relied on in this court is that the contract violates the anti-trust statute of this state. The only fact relied upon to show a trust is an agreement by the plaintiff not to sell beer to anyone else within a certain designated territory contributory to the defendant's place of business. We think the case is distinguishable from the cases heretofore held to violate the anti-trust law, and within the doctrine announced in Gates v. Hooper, 90 Tex. 563, 39 S. W. 1079."

A contract by which one party was to have the exclusive agency and right to sell any and all goods manufactured or kept in stock by the other, and the first-mentioned party was not to sell any goods of that character other than those furnished by such other, is in restraint of trade, and not enforceable at law under the Texas statute. S. S. White Dental Mfg. Co. v. Hertzberg (Tex. Civ. App.) 51 S. W. 355.

A sale under a contract which is invalid under the statute of Texas cannot be upheld, and the contract enforced, where the defense of invalidity under the statute is made, upon the 64 U. R. A.

ground that the sale and delivery to the purchaser were an interstate transaction, where it appears that, after the interstate portion of the transaction had ended, then the trust part of the contract arose. Ibid.

As to what is interstate commerce under Federal anti-trust act, see cases in supra, III. b.

2. Violation of statute as a defense.

Where a foreign corporation contracted with a person for the sale of its goods within the state of Texas, and by the contract gave to such person the exclusive right to sell its goods in that state, the contract also fixing the price at which they should be sold, in an action for the purchase price of the goods sold under such agreement, it was held that the same was a violation of arts. 5313, 5319, Rev. Stat., and void; and no recovery could be had. Pasteur Vaccine Co. v. Burkey, 22 Tex. Civ. App. 232, 54 S. W. 804.

A contract or agreement between a corporation engaged in the manufacture of carriages in another state and a person, whereby, in consideration of its giving to such person the exclusive sale of the vehicles manufactured by it for the state of Texas, except one town, the other person to the contract agreed to handle and sell the work of the company to the exclusion of all similar grades of work, at prices, terms, and conditions mentioned in the contract, falls under the condemnation of the statute against trusts and conspiracies against trade; and, in an action by the company against the other party to the contract upon notes given for vehicles furnished him by the company, the 47

v.

(182 Ill. 551.)

1. Upon a bill to enjoin the creditors of a corporation from selling its property to an organization intent on forming an illegal trust and crushing out competition, evidence is admissible as to the purchase, by the trust, of other plants of similar nature.
2. The withdrawal of their answers, by the defendants, in a suit to enjoin the sale of property to an illegal trust will not prevent consideration of the evidence which had been taken under the issues formed by the answers in disposing of the case.
3. A bill should not be dismissed as to defaulting defendants where it is sufficient to justify the relief prayed for, and its material allegations are sustained by the proofs.
4. Option contracts providing for the sale of plants organized for the manufacture of glucose to a corporation organized to do a banking business and having no authority to purchase such plants, are void.
5. An illegal trust is created by the conveyance, by the stockholders of several competing companies engaged in the manufacturing business, to one company organized for the purpose of taking their property and consolidating their interests.
6. A formal written agreement is not necessary to constitute an illegal trust; invalidity of the agreement for the reason stated is a good defense to the action. Columbia Carriage Co. v. Hatch, 19 Tex. Civ. App. 120, 47 S. W. 288.

Where a corporation engaged in the manufacture and sale of carriages, buggies, and wagons entered into a contract with a firm by which the latter agreed and bound itself to purchase of the company 100 vehicles of its manufacture during a certain year, and it was agreed that the corporation would sell to the firm, and to no other persons in certain towns during that year, the 100 vehicles, or more if required; and the corporation bound itself not to sell any of its goods to any other purchaser or customer,—in an action upon the contract for goods sold, the defendant answered that the agreement was in violation and contravention of the anti-trust law, and also at the same time filed a plea in reconvention against the plaintiff for damages. The court, following the decision of the supreme court in State v. Laredo Ice Co. 96 Tex. 461, 73 S. W. 951, held that, inasmuch as the contract sued upon was in violation of the anti-trust law of Texas, neither party could maintain an action upon it, and therefore the plaintiff could not recover; nor could the defendant recover on its plea of reconvention. Troy Buggy Works Co. v. Eife (Tex. Civ. App.) 74 S. W. 956.

An agreement whereby a wholesale dealer in gloves agreed to sell to a retail merchant the gloves manufactured by it, and not to sell to it is sufficient that concerted action showing an understanding or scheme is shown by the acts of the parties.

7. A stockholder has the right to maintain a suit to enjoin the corporation from entering an illegal trust, where the effect will be to subject the charter to forfeiture and destroy the value of the stock, since it will, in any event, close down the business of the corporation, and prevent the further earning of profits.
8. A stockholder of a corporation may bring an action on behalf of itself and others who shall come in and become parties, to prevent the officers and a majority of the stockholders of the corporation from dealing wrongfully with the corporate property to the injury of stockholders, where it is reasonably certain that a demand upon the proper officers to bring the action would be unavailing.
9. That a foreign corporation doing business in the state has power, under its charter, to relinquish the transaction of a branch of its business, does not authorize it to enter into a trust combination, or sell property required for the transaction of its business in violation of the local laws, or deprive the local courts of the power to see that the business transacted in the state shall not be disposed of in such a way as to violate the local statutes.
10. A contract by one selling his business not to engage in it again for a series of years within the territory where it could be profitably transacted is void as in general restraint of trade.
11. Answering to the same portion of any other merchant in the retailer's city,—and the retailer contracted to handle the wholesaler's gloves exclusively,—falls under the condemnation of the anti-trust law of 1899 (Laws 26th Leg. p. 246, chap. 146); and no action by either can be maintained against the other thereon. Francis T. Simmons & Co. v. Terry (Tex. Civ. App.) 79 S. W. 1103.

3. Not to engage in business.

The anti-trust law does not apply to the sale of a business and the good will thereof, accompanied by an obligation on the part of the seller not to resume business for a limited time at a specified place, where the purchaser is a single person or firm. Comer v. Burton-Lingo Co. 24 Tex. Civ. App. 251, 58 S. W. 969.

And so where there were four different lumber dealers in a town, and three of them combined to buy, and did buy, the stock and good will of the fourth for the purpose of preventing competition and controlling prices, these facts did not show any injury or wrong done to, or suffered by, the firm so selling out; and, there being no allegation of an agreement between the three dealers who purchased the business of the other not to compete with each other, or of an agreement to sell only at certain prices, the public was not affected; and an action to restrain the seller, under the contract not to engage in business in the same place for a certain period of time, was held to be maintainable.

12. A purchaser from defendant pendente lite acquires his interest subject to the decree which shall be rendered on the hearing; so that, in case a decree is entered against the vendor, setting aside the sale, the vendee will be bound thereby.

13. A witness cannot refuse to answer a question merely because it calls for immaterial evidence.

14. Error in sustaining a demurrer of a party disclaiming any interest in the litigation is not sufficient to justify a reversal and remanding of the cause for the purpose of allowing him to answer.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Peoria County to review a judgment in favor of defendants in a suit to prevent the conveyance of the property of the American Glucose Company to the Glucose Sugar Refining Company for the alleged reason that it was an attempt to create a monopoly. Reversed.

Statement by Magruder, J.:

This is a bill filed on August 3, 1897, by the plaintiffs in error against the American Glucose Company, Cicero J. Hamlin, William Hamlin, Harry Hamlin, Joseph Firmenich, George Firmenich, C. H. Matthieson, F. O. Matthieson, and the officers, directors and stockholders of the American Glucose Company, and the unknown owners or holders of the option given by the American Glucose Company for the sale of the plant in Peoria, and the unknown persons having any interest in such option or under it.

The complainants in the bill represent that they were the owners of 203.5 shares of the capital stock of the American Glucose Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the state of New Jersey, with its general offices in Buffalo, New York, and office situate, and plant and property operated, in Peoria, Illinois; that such shares of stock are represented by a certificate issued to said Harding, July 1, 1885; that the Chicago Real-Estate Loan & Trust Company is the equitable owner of said stock as pledgee for the security of a loan, but that said Harding is the owner thereof, subject to the rights of said pledgee; that the capital stock of the American Glucose Company is $1,500,000, the shares being $100 each, but the original issue of said stock (of which the present certificate represents the reduced issue) made the said shares of said Harding 2,035 in number, and of the par value of $203,500, instead of $20,350; that Harding paid in property $203,500 for the original stock; that, by reason of these facts, orators became, and now are, the owners of one sixty-second part of the entire capital stock of the said American Glucose Company, if all of the stock had been issued but about $400,000 of it never was issued, but is owned by the corporation itself; that the American Glucose Company has, for many

In order to constitute a trust under Rev. Stat. 1893, art. 5313, and within the meaning of that statute, there must be a "combination of capital, skill, or acts by two or more." Combination as here used means union or association. If there be no union or association by two or more of their "capital, skill, or acts" there can be no "combination," and hence no "trust." And the union or association of "capital, skill, or acts," denounced, is where the parties in a particular case designed the united co-operation of such agencies which might have been otherwise independent and competing for the accomplishment of one or more of such purposes. Gates v. Hooper, 90 Tex. 563, 39 S. W. 1079.

And so where a merchant sold his stock, and agreed with the purchaser thereof to retire from the mercantile business in the town for the period of twelve months, such agreement is not within the condemnation of that statute; as, by the transaction, neither the capital, skill, nor acts of the parties were brought into any kind of union, association, or co-operative action. Ibid.

See cases in supra, III. d; and Downing v. Lewis, 56 Neb. 386, 76 N. W. 900, supra, IV. n; Hitchcock v. Anthony, 28 C. C. A. 80, 54 U. S. App. 439, 83 Fed. 779, supra, IV. i.

4. Contracts in regard to patents.

A contract, whereby a corporation of another state owning and manufacturing a patented wire fence leased to a person the exclusive right to build, weave, and construct wire fences under its letters patent, in part of a certain county and all of other counties for the term of one year; and whereby such person agreed that all wire pickets and stays and machines used in building fences under said patent should be furnished by said foreign corporation,—is valid, and does not come within the condemnation of the anti-trust statute. Clark v. Cyclone Woven Wire Fence Co. 22 Tex. Civ. App. 41, 54 S. W. 392.

A contract by a corporation which is the owner of a patent windmill, wherein it agrees to give to another party the exclusive right to sell during a year certain the said patent of the windmill manufactured by it in certain named counties, but in no other, such other party not to make any sale below a price list attached to the contract marked "net price," nor above the price list attached marked "selling price,"—is not a contract within the condemnation of the statute against trusts (Acts 1889, chap. 117, p. 141), which inhibits "two or more persons combining their capital, skill, or acts" for certain purposes, as the contract is not a sale, but merely the creation of the relation of principal and agent. Welch v. Phelps & B. Windmill Co. 39 Tex. 633, 36 S. W. 71.

years past, been engaged in the manufacture and sale of glucose and grape sugar in Peoria; that the management during that period has been in the hands of the said Cicero J. Hamlin, late president, and his two sons, William and Harry Hamlin, and the board of directors have been and are now controlled by said Hamlin and sons; that your orators are unable to give a detailed statement of the management and administration of the affairs of the company, because the details thereof have been and are persistently, wilfully, and fraudulently concealed by the said Hamlins and their codefendants from your orators; that the defendants have fraudulently manipulated and controlled the board of directors of said company, and conducted the affairs and business thereof fraudulently, for their own interest and profit, and in gross disregard of the interest of your orators as stockholders, and have fraudulently paid, and still pay, enormous salaries to themselves and others in the business of said company, and, by these and other fraudulent expenditures and practices, have diverted to their own use the profits of said business, and prevented the payment to your orators of such dividends as they were entitled to receive; that, during that entire period, said Hamlins and said defendants have fraudulently controlled, and still fraudulently control, all the capital stock of said company, except that owned by your orators, and a few hundred dollars of stock owned by minority stockholders; that your orators file this bill, not only in their own behalf, but also in behalf of all other stockholders similarly situated, who may see fit to come into this suit and join therein; that said fraudulent salaries paid have been more than ten times the value of the services rendered, and said sums so diverted have amounted to the sum of $100,000 a year during that period, and thereby your orators have been greatly defrauded and injured. The bill further represents that a giant pool, trust, or combine has been recently formed, for the purpose of unlawfully regulating and fixing the price of glucose and grape sugar, being articles of merchandise and commodities manufactured and sold throughout the United States and in this country. The bill further proceeds as follows:

"That the names of the persons forming such pool are now unknown to your orators, who have been unable, after diligent inquiry, to ascertain the same, but they are informed and believe and charge that all said defendants are parties thereto or interested therein, with others unknown; that said pool, trust, and combine is to be accomplished through and in the form of a giant corporation, with many million dollars of capital stock, formed or to be formed under the laws of the state of New Jersey; that the parties organizing, creating, promoting, and managing and interested in the said pool, trust, and combine have recently perfected their arrangements, contracts, and agreements for the purpose of unlawfully monopolizing, controlling, regulating, and fixing the price of glucose and grape sugar within the state of Illinois and the United States, and for such purpose said parties have already obtained control of the factories and plants of nearly all the corporations and individuals heretofore engaged in the manufacture and sale of said commodities in the United States; that, for the purpose aforesaid, the said parties organizing said pool have made overtures to the board of directors of said American Glucose Company to secure the control of the plant and property of the said American Glucose Company, situated and operated in Peoria, and used in the manufacture of said commodities; that said Hamlins and said other defendants, and the directors of said company, whose names are unknown, and when known will be made parties, with said other stockholders unknown, have fraudulently promised and agreed with said parties forming said pool, for the fraudulent purpose aforesaid and in violation of the statutes of Illinois, to sell and transfer and convey to said parties forming said pool, or the corporation to be used as the instrument to carry into effect the said pool, all the plant and property of the said American Glucose Company hereafter more particularly described, situated and used in the said city of Peoria, without the consent of your orators, or either of them, and without the consent of any stockholders except the fraudulent stockholders aforesaid, or said directors, except the fraudulent directors completely under the control of the said Hamlins and interested with them; that the said Hamlins and the said other defendants, and said stockholders and directors, will convey and sell and transfer said plant and property unless enjoined from so doing by the order of court, and are now planning fraudulently, wrongfully, and unlawfully, in violation of the statutes, and arranging to get the authority of the stockholders fraudulently for such sale, other than your orators and independent stockholders, and in violation and fraud of your orators' rights to the premises; that the purpose and intent of the said pool and combination, and of said defendants, jointly and severally, is to create a trust in, and monopoly of, the said articles, and give the said corporation, trust, or pool the power to regulate and fix the price of such articles in the state of Illinois and elsewhere, and to control the entire output throughout the United States amounting now, in the aggregate, to about 1,250,000,000 pounds annually, and consuming about 40,000,000 bushels of corn annually; that said pool and combine, and the effect, intent, and purpose of it, and of the said defendants severally, is in direct violation of the laws of the state and statute, and the method of said pool and combine, and of said parties forming and using the same or interested therein, is to swallow up and merge in this pool the organizations and plants in the United States heretofore engaged in the manufacture and sale of said articles, issuing to the said organizations heretofore engaged stock in said pool and combine or in said trust or corporation, and, where this method fails, to buy such other organizations and plants for cash; that, on account of being unable to deal with your orators in the favorite method above referred to, the said pool and combine, and said parties creating the same, have resorted to the second method above referred to, so far as the American Glucose Company is concerned, and now propose and intend to thus fraudulently and unlawfully obtain the property and plant of said glucose company, and the title and control of it, combining and conspiring with the Hamlins and directors and stockholders, and all the other defendants in this bill, for said purposes, and the said Hamlins, and said stockholders and directors, and the said defendants, are actively and knowingly and unlawfully participating and joining in said fraudulent intent and preparing fraudulently and unlawfully to sell the plant and property aforesaid to the persons and parties aforesaid, for the fraudulent purposes aforesaid; that your orators are informed and believe, and so charge, that said pool, and said parties promoting the same, have unlawfully and wrongfully already purchased, for the purposes aforesaid, the Chicago Sugar Refinery consuming about 26,000 bushels of corn daily in the manufacture of said articles, and the Peoria Grape Sugar Company consuming about 15,000 bushels, and the Rockford Sugar Works consuming about 16,000 bushels of corn daily, and the Davenport Sugar Refinery consuming about 9,000 bushels of corn daily, and the Firmenich Manufacturing Company consuming about 9,000 bushels of corn daily, in the manufacture of said glucose and by-products, and other factories heretofore engaged therein, all consuming more than 100,000 bushels of corn daily in said manufacture; that C. H. Matthieson is one of the men engaged in forming said trust, with F. O. Matthieson, prominently connected with the American Sugar Trust, and the said sugar trust and the said glucose trust are intended, by the said parties forming the same, to work together to control and regulate the price of grape sugar and glucose, and all other sugar products, and the stockholders of said new pool and combine include all the stockholders of said American Glucose Company except your orators and the owners of a few other shares, powerless to prevent said wrongful sale and transfer, without the aid of this court; that, after diligent inquiry, your orators have not been able to ascertain the price at which the plant and property of said American Glucose Company or pool is to be so sold and transferred to said pool, although they have repeatedly applied to the officers and directors of said company to learn the same, and to the said defendants to ascertain the same, and they charge that such price has been wrongfully and fraudulently agreed upon at so small a sum as to be destructive of the value of your orators' said stock, and said Hamlins, and said stockholders and directors, and said defendants, co-operating in the said fraudulent conspiracy, are to fraudulently receive, in addition, large sums as a bonus for such unlawful and fraudulent sale, to go to them individually, none of which will accrue to the benefit of your orators and the other stockholders of said company, or to said company, and your orators, if possible, are to be frozen out and defrauded by the carrying out of said contract of sale, contrary to equity and good conscience and the statutes of this state; that there is now no occasion for the sale of the said plant and property in Peoria; that it ought not to be sold; that it is to the interest of the stockholders of said American Glucose Company and of said company and of the public, that the said company continue to own and manage its property and plant, and manufacture, as heretofore; that such manufacture now is, and is becoming exceedingly profitable; and all that prevents great profits, and such continuance of ownership and conduct of business, is said fraudulent conspiracy of said parties above named or referred to as defendants to this bill.

"Orators charge that Joseph Firmenich, C. H. Matthieson, F. O. Matthieson, George Firmenich, George W. Lamb, secretary of the said American Glucose Company, and Thomas Grant, and the officers, directors, and stockholders of said company, are fraudulently co-operating and conspiring with and aiding the said Hamlins, and so are all the other parties defendant herein, and they control more than half the entire capital stock of said American Glucose Company, and will fraudulently sell and transfer to said trust said plant and property of the said American Glucose Company, to the great wrong and injury of your orators, unless restrained by the court; that the said

Hamblins and the other directors of said American Glucose Company, if said plant and property be allowed to remain under the control of said Hamblins and of said company, will wreck and destroy it, and destroy the value of your orators' stock therein; that to prevent this a receiver should be appointed for the said American Glucose Company and its property and the business of said company carried on by such receiver, under the directions of this court, until an accounting can be had in the premises, and said company reorganized, under the direction of this court, and its property and business preserved for its stockholders, and such other relief granted as may be proper in the premises; that all the acts of said defendants above referred to, and of the said pool and trust interested in the same, are with the fraudulent intent to effect a combination of capital, skill, and of firms and persons, to limit and reduce the production of glucose and grape sugar, and regulate and fix and control and change, at their will, the price of the same, and to prevent competition in the manufacture and sale, and to make contracts by which all of said parties shall bind themselves not to sell the same below its price, and to keep the price at a fixed figure, so as to prevent a free and unrestricted competition, in violation of the statute of Illinois entitled 'An Act to Define Trusts and Conspiracies against Trade,' etc., approved June 20, 1893, in force July 1, 1893; that all the acts of said defendants and of said pool are with the fraudulent purpose to regulate and fix the price of said commodities, and to limit the amount of manufacture; that the said articles—glucose and grape sugar—are not articles of merchandise the cost of which is mainly made up in wages, and the purpose and intent of said parties, or the principal object of or the effect of their said acts, are not to maintain or increase wages, all of which is in violation of the act to provide for the punishment of persons or corporations forming pools, approved June 11, 1891, and amended in 1897, and said acts of defendants are with the intent to place the management and control of such combination and pool, and the manufactured product, in the hands of a trustee or trustees, to limit and fix the price, and lessen the production and sale, of said articles, and to prevent the manufacture thereof, except as controlled by them, in violation of said statutes of the state of Illinois; that the legal description of the real estate on which the said plant, machinery, etc., of said American Glucose Company is situated, in Peoria, Illinois, and which real estate is a part of said plant is a part of lot numbered 6, in Frink & Sanger's extended addition to the city of Peoria, etc., situated in the southwest 64 L. R. A.

quarter of section 17, etc.; that the glucose business is a business of enormous proportions, to which it has recently grown; that the manufacturers thereof now produce about 40 pounds out of a bushel of corn; that it is a white, mobile, sweet syrup, weighing about 12 pounds to the gallon, with many properties and uses, daily extended, of value and importance to the health and wealth of the country; that it formerly sold it at about 7 cents per pound; that its price ruled, before the formation of said trust and pool and before its plans for incorporation, as low as 70 cents per 100 pounds; that its products were, and still are, used everywhere, and their commercial importance and manifold by-products are outranked in few instances; that it is an important constituent for fine table syrups, and used in every household, and in making jellies and jams, confectioners' jellies and brewers' glucose, in the manufacture of leather, dyes, and many medicines and candies and in the manufacture of beers and wines and cordials, and it is an anhydrous sugar, and of universal necessity and its by-products are used in the manufacture of paints, and are substituted for olive oil, and are used for food for horses, cattle, and sheep, and from the residue is produced common meal from the hulls of corn, by grinding; that these are but the beginnings of its uses, daily discovered and daily extended, beginning about 1867 at 50 bushels of corn per day, and now amounting to over 100,000 bushels per day, of which 60,000 bushels per day are used at home and 40,000 bushels are exported; that great skill and vast capital are employed in said business, making competition so great that the price of glucose has gradually worked down, but good profits and great fortunes have been and are still realized therefrom, and from the manufacture, and in the purchase of the plants, said new trust proposes to further increase the profits by limiting production and regulating prices, and reducing operating expenses and cost of same,—all in violation of the letter and the spirit of the statutes of Illinois, and in various ways best known to other monster trusts of the same class in other industries; that it is not an easy matter for persons or corporations to go into this business, and this new proposed organization includes plants engaged in both glucose and grape sugar, and that it requires considerable time to erect a plant, and some of the most important processes are patented and owned by the owners of the present plants, forbidding their use in new factories and for the further reason that it requires special skill and experienced men to erect and operate a modern glucose plant which can compete at all with these great concerns, much less with this great proposed trust, and the proper class of men to operate same is limited in number, and not easily obtained, and the best men are controlled by the owners of the present plants, and will be controlled by the proposed trust; that the organizers and promoters of this proposed glucose trust propose and intend to stop competition and limit production, and regulate and fix prices, by closing up several of the plants which they have purchased or agreed to buy; that the effect of the destruction of competition in this business is already shown in the fact the price per hundred is now $1.25 as against 70 cents per 100 pounds two months ago and by far the greater part of this gain of 55 cents was made within the few days past, and is due to the formation of this trust and to the shutting down, actual or expected, of the plants, in the interest of the said trust and the price, now nearly doubled, will still further advance and is entirely within the control of this organization, which will control 95 per cent of the glucose plants of this country, and will practically destroy all competition and dictate prices; that the plants which are not yet in the new organization have agreed to fix the price as named by said proposed trust, which makes said trust absolute master of this mighty product of such vital importance to every class of men in the United States, and especially in this state, whose chief product is corn, and where many of the now competing plants to be swallowed up are situated; that the American Glucose Company is a corporation organized under the laws of New Jersey; that, on inquiry from the officers of said company, your orators have learned that the president has given a cash option for the plant at Peoria, and has been informed that it has been accepted; that this option has been given to said proposed trust, and that an acceptance has been given by this trust, as so stated, and that a special stockholders' meeting has been called, of which notice has been given your orators by printed notice, of which exhibit A, attached, is a copy, as follows, to wit:

"The board of directors of the American Glucose Company, on this 19th day of July, 1897, declare and resolve that it is advisable that this corporation relinquish the business of manufacturing glucose and grape sugar, and such other business as it has hitherto engaged in at the city of Peoria and state of Illinois; that the nature of its business be changed accordingly; that the branch of its business at Peoria be relinquished, its manufacturing business be confined to the manufacture of starch at Buffalo, its plant and property at Peoria be sold, and that a meeting of the stockholders be called to meet in

"To this is attached, namely:

"You will please take notice that a meeting will be held at the office of the company in Buffalo on the 3d of August, 1897, for the purposes specified in such resolution.

"July 18, 1897. George W. Lamb, Sec.

"Your orators further show that this proposition referred to in said exhibit A, to give up the business of manufacturing glucose and grape sugar and other business in Peoria, and sell its plant, indicates the mode in which this new trust has planned and intends to control the glucose business of this country, and that for that purpose it intends to absorb the business of the American Glucose Company at Peoria, Illinois; that said American plant is one of the largest of the rival manufacturing plants of the country, consuming daily 26,000 bushels of corn,—nearly one third of the total manufacture of glucose and grape sugar and 90 per cent of the glucose and grape sugar manufactured in this state,—and this option and proposed purchase now proposed to be fraudulently ratified by the stockholders on August 3, 1897, will practically destroy all competition in the manufacture of this most useful product in the state of Illinois, and will leave the new trust omnipotent in the markets of this state and Chicago, the largest and best in the world, and will destroy the property and business of said glucose company, and irreparably injure your orators.

"Your orators charge that they have not been able to ascertain at what price the said option is given, although they have applied to learn at the office of the company and to its officers, but they are informed and believe that it is a price destructive to the value of the stock and some contract exists by which the great sacrifice of this property is to be made good at the option of certain stockholders, not including your orators nor the minority not interested in said fraudulent conspiracy, but the benefits of said sacrifice will inure to the stockholders who are stockholders of the new trust, and that a scheme is adopted, or to be adopted, by which this pretended sale will effect a sacrifice of the interests of your orators in said property for the benefit of other people and other stockholders, which is against equity and good conscience; that the country and people are now at the bottom of the panic, but business is rapidly improving, and the price for which this plant is proposed to be sold is a panic price, which sale ought not to be made, and said American Glucose Company has no call nor necessity to make such sale, and its real interests are to continue in the manufacture of glucose in the business heretofore profitable to them, and which cannot be less profitable than at present; and that by retaining the plant the said American Glucose Company will enjoy the enhanced price and share in the prosperity of this and all other business about to be realized; that negotiations were begun for the creation of this trust some time ago,—precisely when cannot now be ascertained by your orators, because of the secrecy observed by those engaged in the conspiracy against the public weal,—but your orators charge that the creation was within three months past, and negotiations for the purpose of secretly forming the trust began about that time with the said American Glucose Company, the plant of which at Peoria is regarded and is an essential element to the creation of such monopoly, without which no such trust could profitably be formed and that at first, and up to a late date, the negotiations and organization had taken the shape of a union of the plants above described, and were and are intended to include the plant in Peoria of said American Glucose Company; that, in whatever form they may be made to appear the real organization and substance of said glucose trust is a union of said plants embracing all plants outside of said American Glucose Company and seeking to include said company and its plant in Peoria but that for some unknown reason, believed to be because there was some outstanding stock such as that of your orators, which it was necessary to get up, or the parties in charge of said negotiations on the part of said American Glucose Company were unwilling to have a full share in the profits that would accrue to the American Glucose Company by such organization given to said outstanding stockholders, its officers, secretly conducting the said negotiations, have chosen said form of sale, and chosen that the first step should be uniting in said trust an ostensible sale of said plant at Peoria to said company for cash; that, in order that the trust might go forward, a price was named by the president for said plant, and was accepted by said glucose trust, and your orators allege, upon information and belief, and allege as a fact, so far as concerns themselves, that such price, and all the details of said negotiations, have been kept secret at all times, and still are kept secret, especially from your orators, who have been unable, after much inquiry, to learn the truth; that your orators allege that they are informed and believe that options are outstanding, given by said trust as a part of this sale to said Hamlin and the other defendants to this bill, to take said stock of said trust, giving a most favorable price, and an option to take said stock in lieu of cash, greatly increasing the value of the stock of said preferred stockholders; that said stock in said trust company has been listed to the amount of $40,000,000, as your orators are informed and believe upon the New York Stock Exchange, of which $14,000,000 are preferred stock and the remainder is common stock; that said stock is now selling, as the market reports show, at 105 cents on the dollar offered for it, but offered on the exchange to be sold only at the sum of 115 cents on the dollar; that your orators cannot learn, after much inquiry, whether the deed for said plant has been prepared or executed or delivered in escrow nor whether the call of said meeting on August 3d for said ratification is merely a form, or whether this form precedes or succeeds the sale and conveyance to said trust, but allege, upon information and belief, that the deed has not yet been delivered, although prepared, and that the possession of the plant has not yet been delivered, although ready for delivery; that a time is fixed, August 10th, or earlier, for such delivery; that payment has not yet been made; that the money for such payment lies in escrow in the hands of the Illinois Trust & Savings Bank of Chicago, and with it, as claimed, said deed; that the works of said plant at Peoria prepared to deliver it, have been closed down and shut up, and that the agents, managers, and officers lately in charge are now absent, the office having been removed by the said conspirators ostensibly from Peoria to Buffalo; that they are now engaged in the necessary preliminaries for the performance of said contract, as made by said president, and a part of the officers are in Peoria, engaged in preparing the plant for sale and delivery, by direction of said Hamlin; that if any information or notice should be given to the officers or defendants of any opposition to said sale or as to the filing of this bill, or of any application for an injunction, immediate delivery would be made, in order to defeat said injunction; that the said 203 shares of stock of your orators, originally of the par value of $203,500, and only cut down to avoid taxation, have cost and were of the original value to your orators of the sum of $500,000; that by said sale, if carried out, the most valuable parts of the property and business of said American Glucose Company will be sacrificed, and your orators' stock will be reduced in value to less than one twentieth of its cost, but, if said property is retained and continued to be operated as heretofore, said stock, in the approaching prosperity now dawning upon the country, will enable your orators to realize a much larger per cent of the said value, and repay the original cost of $500,000, instead of the pitiful sum for which, under said alleged contract and fraudulent sale, it is now being sacrificed; that said plant at Peoria consists of buildings and appurtenances admirably fitted for the purpose of manufacturing glucose and grape sugar, and in all particulars is a modern plant; that it is situated upon the southwest quarter of section 17, in township 8, range 8 north, in Peoria county, Illinois, and owned by said company, as accurately described elsewhere; that some of the stockholders of the American Glucose company who have promoted this sale to the said trust are interested as beneficiaries in the trust, and as stockholders therein, obtained by them in part by the sale to said trust of parts or the whole of other factories, and that said stockholders of said American Glucose Company, under option given or understandings with said trust, will be able to realize larger returns than those which are claimed to be dividends, out of said sale or its proceeds, to accrue to your orators.

"Your orators allege, upon information and belief, that said American Glucose Company has been conducted as a private company under charge of the said Hamlins, and its proceeds, or the proceeds of its business, have been fraudulently and wrongfully diverted to the pockets of said Hamlins in divers and sundry ways, and, among others, in payment of enormous and fraudulent salaries to themselves and others interested with them, and in payments for contracts, corn, etc., or materials, made by agents or other persons representing the dominating stockholders, and an accounting ought to be had in favor of your orators with said stockholders, consisting of the Hamlins and others, and the company, to ascertain the amount of moneys which your orators charge have been so abstracted contrary to equity, from the treasury of said company, and of dividends so wrongfully paid, and your orators ask for an order referring the case to the master for the purpose of such action.

"Your orators further show that they fear and believe and so charge, that the contract of sale between the American Glucose Company and the new trust has been carried so far that it may be possible to claim, on the part of the contracting parties, that the contract has been executed by the delivery of the deed in escrow, in which event your orators ask the relief that the trust shall not be permitted to enter into possession or use or operate the plant, and shall not be permitted to pay, nor the American Glucose Company to receive, any further sum, or take any further action, in performance of the said contract, by delivery of deed or by other action; that it is part of the said contract of sale, they are advised, that the American Glucose Company shall agree not to further continue the manufacture of glucose, and shall not use their factories elsewhere which can be used for such purpose, and thus promote the said trust; that the proposition sought by said conspirators to be ratified on August 3, 1897, to relinquish the manufacture of glucose at Peoria or elsewhere, is a part of said contract, because said American Glucose Company prefers to dispose of their plant for cash, in form, rather than take part in the formation of a new company, and to permit them to convert their cash received into stock or otherwise, by secret agreement, exclusive of your orators, the object of such trust in acquiring said plant at Peoria being well known to them; that the transaction, as proposed to be made by said American Glucose Company and said trust, is simply a mode of union of the glucose plants of the country after the manner of the Standard Oil Company, and will constitute a grand monopoly, for the purpose of controlling, regulating, and fixing the price of glucose and glucose by-products, syrup, and the sugar of the country, for the entire market of Illinois and the United States, and your orators pray that the stockholders be enjoined from ratifying said transactions and sale of said plant, and such relinquishment of the manufacture, on the 3d day of August, 1897, or taking any steps to aid in the creation of said trust or any other trust, or to ratify the offer or option for the sale of said plant; that all the other stockholders of the American Glucose Company, so far as known to your orators, and certainly the great majority, consisting of the Hamlins and family, and the Firmenichs, and others of like character or associated with them, regard themselves and are interested in the consummation of this sale for a consideration unknown to your orators and believed to be outside consideration to be paid therefor, and so they and the officers and directors of the American Glucose Company are hostile to the interests of your orators, and to the true interests of the stockholders, and are desirous of carrying out said sale, and to make said deed and delivery of possession under said contract of sale, and it is worse than useless to ask said company, or the directors and officers, to file this bill or unite in it, or take the proper steps to defeat the action of the president, as shown by said option, now proposed to be ratified on August 3, 1897; that since said offer of sale of said plant, and since said price was made and named by President Hamlin to said trust in said option, said plant has greatly increased in value, for the value of its products has doubled,—for example since July 1, 1897, the value of glucose has increased from 70 cents per 100 pounds to $1.60 per 100 pounds, the lowest price for glucose being when said option was made and accepted; that said Hamlin had no right or power to offer said plant, or to agree to the conditions of said offer, especially that the company should relinquish the manufacture of glucose and other by-products and grape sugar, and withdraw from competition with said trust company, which said option contains; that the said proposed corporation of New Jersey, which is the said glucose trust aforesaid, has not, as yet, elected any president or other officers, and that said American Glucose Company is a corporation of New Jersey, and incorporated under the laws thereof, although doing its business within this state, at Peoria, in the manufacture of glucose, which constitutes its main business, but its general offices, formerly at Peoria, have now been fraudulently removed to Buffalo, and that said factory constituting said plant has been closed; that in some way, unknown to and concealed from, your orators, the said American Glucose Company has, by its officers, obtained some contract, or options, or understandings, permitting them to take stock in said trust company on terms that will give to them, as a consideration of said plant, and so as to give them, for their stock, a consideration much greater than now proposed to be paid and to be given pro rata to your orators, for such price will only give your orators a dividend of one twentieth of the cost of the said stock, and is a great sacrifice of your orators' interest in said property.

"To the end, therefore, that your orators may have equity in the premises; and that the American Glucose Company, Cicero J. Hamlin, William Hamlin, Harry Hamlin, Joseph Firmenich, George Firmenich, C. H. Matthieson, F. O. Matthieson, the officers, directors, and stockholders of the American Glucose Company, the unknown owners or holders of the option given by the president of the American Glucose Company for the sale of the plant in Peoria, the unknown persons having any interest in said option or under it, all of whom are made parties defendants, may be duly summoned to answer (but not under oath, their oaths being waived); that there may be an accounting, under the order of the court; and that your orators may have decreed to them such dividends or sums as they may be found entitled to as stockholders of said stock; and to the end that all of the said defendants and agents may be restrained and enjoined from closing up the business of manufacturing glucose and grape sugar, and such other business as said American Glucose Company has hitherto engaged in in the city of Peoria, and from changing the business, and from relinquishing this branch of the business and from carrying out in any way said option for sale or transfer of said property, or any part thereof, and from aiding or assisting any of the said acts, and from selling or transferring the said plant to any pool, trust, or combine, or any association, corporation, or individual, in violation of the laws of Illinois, or to any person, or corporation or pool, or trust, or association, etc., to enable them to regulate or fix the price of glucose, or grape sugar, or by-products, or to fix the amount to be manufactured of same, and from any other violations of said acts of the general assembly of Illinois, approved June 11, 1891, and amended in 1897, and also act approved June 20, 1893; and that a receiver may be appointed of the said American Glucose Company to take charge of and protect and preserve its plant and property, and manage same, under the orders of this court; and that such injunction may be made perpetual; and to the end that your orators may have such other and further and different relief in the premises as equity may require."

This bill was sworn to, and the injunction writ was granted, as therein prayed. The summons and injunction writ were served upon the American Glucose Company, at Peoria, on August 3, 1897, the day the bill was filed. Answers to the bill were at once filed by the American Glucose Company, Cicero J. Hamlin, William Hamlin, Harry Hamlin, and the officers, directors, and stockholders of the American Glucose Company (except the complainants in the bill). The solicitors for the defendants who thus answered were Frank D. Locke and Stevens, Horton & Abbott. On August 9, 1897, in vacation, a motion was made on behalf of the defendants, who thus answered by their solicitors, to dissolve the injunction on the answers and affidavits filed. On August 10, 1897, replications were filed by the complainants to all of said answers. On August 10, 1897, an affidavit by George F. Harding, and certain exhibits thereto were filed, and it was subsequently agreed by counsel that the said affidavit should be treated as a deposition. On the same day, August 10, 1897, the defendants, Joseph Firmenich and George Firmenich, demurred jointly and severally to the whole bill. The counsel filing the demurrer for them were Moran, Kraus, and Mayer. On August 11, 1897, in vacation, the circuit judge dissolved the injunction; and thereupon counsel for the American Glucose Company, and the Hamlins and other defendants, answering the bill, asked leave to file suggestion of damages. Such suggestion of damages amounting to $7,000, was filed on August 13, 1897. Immediately upon the dissolution of the injunction, on August 11, 1897, complainants below asked and obtained leave to amend the bill and to make new parties defendants. Thereupon, on August 13, 1897, complainants filed an amendment to their bill by inserting the following: "Upon information and belief, the plaintiffs charge that the name of said pool, trust, and combine so formed, or to be formed, is the Glucose Sugar Refining Company, a corporation under the laws of the state of New Jersey; that the said Illinois Trust & Savings Bank is in some way connected with it, and interested in said trust and formation thereof, and in said proposed sale and transfer of said plant and property, and in said option; that they, the plaintiffs, allege against the said Glucose Sugar Refining Company and the Illinois Trust & Savings Bank, and each of them, all matters and things alleged in this bill against the other defendants hereto, or either of them and that said bank has no right or authority, under its charter, to purchase or receive title to said property or any interest therein; that said American Glucose Company has no authority or power nor its officers, directors, or stockholders, to do any corporate act, or the proposed acts referred to in said exhibit A, nor all or any or either of them, at Buffalo, New York, because the same is beyond the limits of the state chartering said company to wit, New Jersey. By inserting on the next page of said bill, just after the words, 'acceptance thereof and each of them,' the words, 'the Glucose Sugar Refining Company, a corporation under the laws of the state of New Jersey, and the Illinois Trust & Savings Bank, a corporation under the laws of the state of Illinois,' thus making the said last two named corporations defendants to said bill. By inserting in the prayer for summons in said bill the names of defendants the Glucose Sugar Refining Company and the Illinois Trust & Savings Bank as above described."

The Illinois Trust & Savings Bank made defendant to the amended bill was served on August 19, 1897, and on September 4, 1897, entered its appearance, and filed a general demurrer to the bill by its counsel, Wilson, Moore & McIlvaine, the senior member of the firm being John P. Wilson. On October 28, 1897, the Glucose Sugar Refining Company, made defendant by the amended bill, was served with summons by the sheriff of Peoria county, and on October 29, 1897, by the sheriff of Cook county. On November 17, 1897, the Glucose Sugar Refining Company, by John P. Wilson, its solicitor, and Wilson, Moore, & McIlvaine, of counsel, filed a paper purporting to be a demurrer of said defendant to a part of the amended bill and a special answer to the residue thereof. This demurrer and answer in one is as follows: "This defendant to so much of complainants' amended bill as charges and sets forth the formation of a pool, trust, or combine for the purpose of unlawfully regulating and fixing the price of glucose and grape sugar, and of acquiring and purchasing factories and plants engaged in the manufacture and sale of glucose, and as charges that the board of directors of the American Glucose Company, Cicero J. Hamlin and sons, and any other of the defendants, have promised, arranged, and agreed that the parties forming and controlling the said alleged pool, trust, or combine to sell, transfer, convey, and set over to them, or to the corporation which is to be used by them to accomplish their said purpose, the plant and property of the said American Glucose Company in Peoria; and to so much of said amended bill as sets forth and charges that the purpose and intention of the said pool, trust, or combine, and of defendants to said amended bill, is to create a trust in, and monopoly of, the articles manufactured at the plant of the said American Glucose Company in Peoria, and to give the corporation of such pool, trust, or combine the power to regulate and fix the price of said articles, and to control the entire output thereof, in the state of Illinois and elsewhere, and that the method of the parties forming said pool has been and is to swallow up and merge in itself the organizations and plants heretofore engaged in the manufacture and sale of said articles, issuing to the latter stock of said pool or in such trust corporations, and, where this method fails, to buy such organizations for cash; and as to so much of the said bill as relates or sets forth each and every of the charges therein contained in relation to the formation of any pool, trust, or combine by the defendants thereto, or any of them, for the purpose of securing a monopoly or limiting the output, or fixing or controlling the price, of glucose or any other products heretofore manufactured at the plant of the said American Glucose Company in Peoria; and as to so much of said bill as relates to the purchase by said pool, or this defendant, of any other plant or property other than that owned by the American Glucose Company at Peoria; and as to so much of the said amended bill as relates to the purposes for which the proposed purchasers of said plant contracted to purchase the said plant, and to the use which is to be made of said plant by the said purchaser; and as to so much of the said amended bill as relates to the extent and character of the glucose business and of their by-products; and as to so much of said amended bill as prays for any relief based upon said parts of said bill,—this defendant demurs, and for cause of demurrer shows that plaintiffs have not made such a case as entitles them to the relief prayed for, and prays judgment of the court as to such parts of the bill. And as to the residue of the bill this defendant for answer says it has no knowledge or information as to whether the complainants own said stock, and leaves the complainants to make proof thereof; that it has no knowledge as to the value of the stock of the American Glucose Company or the amount of its capital stock, or the cost thereof to complainants, and therefore leaves complainants to make proof thereof, and neither admits nor denies the same; that it has no knowledge regarding the management of the affairs of the American Glucose Company, or relations thereto of the defendants, Cicero J., William, and Harry Hamlin, nor as to salaries or dividends, and therefore neither admits nor denies the allegations touching the same, but leaves the complainants to make proof thereof as they may be advised; that this defendant is a corporation duly organized under the laws of the state of New Jersey, for the purpose of, and lawfully engaged in the business of, manufacturing glucose and grape sugar and other products of corn, in Illinois; that by its deed, bearing date August 7, 1897, the American Glucose Company conveyed to Edwin L. Johnson its plant in Peoria, which deed was delivered August 11, 1897, and recorded August 12, 1897 (copy attached and made a part hereof, marked 'exhibit A'); that said Johnson, by his deed bearing date the 9th of August, 1897, conveyed to defendant said plant, deed being delivered August 11th, and recorded August 12th (copy attached, marked 'exhibit B'); that at the date of the delivery of said deeds it paid for the premises so conveyed, in cash; that at the date of delivery of said deeds from the American Glucose Company to Johnson and from Johnson to this defendant, purchase price was paid in cash to the American Glucose Company, the amount paid in cash on the 11th of August being $1,977,000, including personal property used with the said plant, and conveyed by bill of sale to defendant by the American Glucose Company, and that immediately after delivery of said deeds defendant entered into possession of said plant, and has ever since continued in possession, and has been operating said plant continuously in the manufacture of glucose and other products of corn. Defendant denies that said Hamlin, or stockholders or directors or officers of the American Glucose Company, were on the 13th of August, 1897, or before, interested, as stockholders or otherwise, in this defendant corporation, or were interested in the organization or connected with it, or had any interest in the purchase, except as stockholders and officers of said American Glucose Company; and denies that said Hamlin and other defendants, officers or directors of the American Glucose Company, have at any time confederated or conspired with any of the other defendants for the purpose of, or in connection with, the sale of the plant of the said American Glucose Company to this defendant, or any of the other defendants, except as officers of said glucose company; that it admits said American Glucose Company is a corporation organized under the laws of New Jersey; that an option was given to purchase the plant at Peoria to the Illinois Trust & Savings Bank, which said option was afterwards duly assigned to Edwin L. Johnson, grantee of the deed from the American Glucose Company; admits that a special stockholders' meeting of the stockholders of the American Glucose Company was called, as alleged in said bill, but denies on information and belief, that any option was given at any time to said Hamlin, or to any officers, directors, or stockholders of the American Glucose Company, to take or receive any of the stock of this defendant at any price, or upon any terms whatsoever, at any time. Defendant denies, on information and belief, that any of the stockholders of the American Glucose Company have or will, directly or indirectly, receive any greater returns out of the said sale of the plant than a pro rata share of the price, or that any options or understandings have at any time existed between the officers or stockholders of the American Glucose Company, with any other person or persons whatsoever by means of which said officers and stockholders would derive any benefit from the said sale of said plant, other than through the distribution of the proceeds of said sale by the American Glucose Company between the stockholders; and denies that any collateral agreements have ever existed for the benefit of any stockholders in the American Glucose Company, permitting them to convert their cash into stock, or otherwise participating in any benefits resulting from the sale of said plant not common to said complainants or of said stockholders; and denies that the American Glucose Company, or any of its officers, agents, or directors, have at any time obtained any contract permitting them to take stock or to become interested or derive any benefits from the sale of said plant, other than through the consideration paid in cash, or that they have any right to receive, or option to receive, any benefit or advantage, in any way, otherwise than through the cash consideration and distribution to the stockholders; alleges that at a meeting of the stockholders of the American Glucose Company held at the city of Camden, in the state of New Jersey, on August 28, 1897, the stockholders of said corporation ratified and confirmed the action of the president and directors in selling the plant at Peoria, as hereinbefore stated, and voted to relinquish the business of manufacturing glucose and grape sugar in Peoria, and that its manufacturing business should be confined to the manufacture of starch at Buffalo, by a vote of two thirds of the stockholders, and to reduce the capital stock from $1,500,000 to $150,000, and the stock actually issued from $1,322,500 to $132,250, and that the proceeds of the sale should be distributed among the stockholders pro rata, and that by an instrument signed by the owners of 12,590.4 shares of capital stock of said company, out of a total number of said shares of stock outstanding of 13,225, each of said changes and action so held was ratified, and the action was duly certified to and filed with the secretary of state of the state of New Jersey for the purpose of effecting the decrease of the capital stock and changes in the charter to said company (a copy of which is attached as exhibit C, and made a part hereof), and by this action of said stockholders and officers the sale of said plant was duly and regularly ratified and confirmed, and the changes in the charter and capital stock were regularly made; and denies that any other matter or thing in the said bill of complaint as amended, not hereinbefore demurred to or answered, is true."

Exhibit A, referred to in the answer of the Glucose Sugar Refining Company, is an indenture or deed by which the American Glucose Company, for $1,750,000, warrants to Edwin L. Johnson the plant in Peoria. It is dated August 7, 1897, and recorded August 12, 1897. Exhibit B to said answer of the American Glucose Company is a deed from Johnson to the Glucose Sugar Refining Company of said plant, granting to said trust said plant in Peoria in consideration of $10 and other good and valuable considerations. It is dated August 9, and recorded August 12, 1897. Exhibit C to said answer is a certificate of the American Glucose Company, by William Hamlin, as president, and Henry E. Grant, secretary, dated August 30, 1897, certifying that the company has reduced its authorized capital stock from $1,500,000 to $150,000, and its stock actually issued from $1,322,500, to $132,250, and has ratified the action of its stockholders at their meeting on August 3, 1897, to give up the business of glucose and such other business as it has been engaged in in Peoria, and that it has changed, accordingly, the nature of its business, and given up its business in Peoria, and confines its business to the manufacture of starch in Buffalo, and directed that its plant and property at Peoria be sold, and has ratified the action of the president and directors in selling the plant at Peoria to Edwin L. Johnson, of Chicago, and has authorized the distribution of the proceeds received from such sale among the stockholders, said changes having been declared by resolution of the board of directors to be advisable, and having been duly and regularly assented to by more than two thirds of the stockholders at a meeting called by the board of directors to be held at Camden on August 28, 1897, and the written assent of said stockholders being hereto appended. This certificate was signed by the president and secretary on August 30, 1897, and to this certificate is appended a certificate by a notary public, William Johnson, that Grant swore to the above facts stated in said certificates, etc.; and a certificate to this is appended of George Bingham, clerk of Erie county, New York, where said William Johnson purported to be a notary public, that Johnson was a notary public, etc., dated August 30, 1897. To this also is appended a ratification of the action by the stockholders at a meeting held on the 3d day of August, 1897, declaring it advisable that the corporation relinquish the business of manufacturing glucose in Peoria, and confine itself to the manufacture of starch at Buffalo, and that its plant and property at Peoria be sold, and also ratifying the action of the president and board of directors in selling said property to Edwin L. Johnson, and giving assent to each and every one of such changes, and to each and every one of the acts aforesaid, which paper is dated August 28, 1897, and purports to be signed by the holders of 12,590 shares of stock; and to this is appended the certificate of the secretary of the state of New Jersey that the foregoing is a true copy of the certificate of decrease of the capital stock, etc., filed in the office on the 3d day of September, 1897.

Testimony was taken on behalf of the complainants in the bill before a notary public in Chicago at various times in the months of October and November and December, 1897, beginning on October 11, 1897, and ending on December 17, 1897. During this period, thirteen witnesses were examined on behalf of the complainants, and John P. Wilson and John S. Stevens appeared on behalf of defendants. In April and May, 1898, the depositions of three witnesses were taken on behalf of the defendants before a commissioner in Buffalo, New York, and these depositions were filed in the circuit court of Peoria county, June 1, 1898. On June 6, 1898, the demurrers of the Illinois Trust & Savings Bank and of Joseph Firmenich and George Firmenich to the whole bill, and the demurrer of the Glucose Sugar Refining Company to a part of the bill, were sustained; and thereupon the complainants came and abided by their bill.

On June 21, 1898, the cause came on for hearing before the circuit judge, and it appeared that a subpoena duces tecum had been served on Conrad H. Matthieson, president of the Glucose Sugar Refining Company of New Jersey, to appear as a witness, and produce the underwriters' agreement of the Glucose Sugar Refining Company, and the option contracts for the sale to the bank by the six corporations above named of their respective properties, and other papers and books named in said subpoena, and all letters, records, and documents touching the organization of said Glucose Sugar Refining Company. Said Matthieson did not appear, and thereupon the complainants moved for an attachment against him; whereupon attorneys for the defendants resisted said motion. In the course of the argument on said motion, Stevens, Horton, & Abbott moved for leave to withdraw the answers filed by that firm for the American Glucose Company, the Hamlins, and all the officers, directors, and stockholders of the American Glucose Company (other than complainants), and to withdraw their appearance for said defendants. Complainants objected to this motion, but the court allowed it; and thereupon the following order was entered, on June 22, 1898, to which date the hearing had been adjourned from June 21, 1898, to wit: "Now come the parties herein, by their respective solicitors, and on motion of Stevens, Horton, & Abbott, as solicitors for the American Glucose Company, Cicero J. Hamlin, William Hamlin, Harry Hamlin, and directors of said company, and the stockholders of said company (other than defendants herein), leave is hereby given said defendants to withdraw their answers herein; and, the same being done, it is hereby ordered that the bill of complaint, as herein amended, be, and the same is hereby, taken as confessed by said defendants and every of them; and, on motion of said attorneys, Stevens, Horton & Abbott, their appearance as solicitors for said defendants is hereby withdrawn, and the appearance of said firm is hereby entered as one of the solicitors for the defendant herein the Glucose Sugar Refining Company."

The motion of the complainants for an attachment was then further argued, but said attorneys for defendants claimed that no evidence from said Matthieson was then required, as the truth of the allegations of the bill was admitted by their demurrer, and by the decree pro confesso entered. John P. Wilson then stated to the court that the said Matthieson would attend on the next morning as a witness. Matthieson produced in court from his possession the option contracts or agreements between the Illinois Trust & Savings Bank and the Peoria Grape Sugar Company, and between the bank and the Rockford Sugar Refining Company, and between the bank and the American Preservers' Company, and between the bank and the Firmerich Manufacturing Company, but stated that the option contract with the Chicago Sugar Refining Company was not among the papers, and that he did not know where it was. Counsel for complainants offered the option contracts in evidence for the purpose of showing that the transaction of the American Glucose Company was part of the same transaction of five other corporations, and was all one. Wilson refused to allow counsel for complainants to see the option contracts unless the court should so order, and, when the court decided that the counsel of complainants had a right to inspect the contracts, Wilson announced that he would send the books and papers out of the court room, and handed the same to his assistant, with instructions to take them from the court room. Thereupon the court, after an inspection of the contracts by the court, decided that the contracts were not material, but held that they might be inserted in the record and shown by the record. The court refused to allow counsel for complainants to inquire of Matthieson, the witness, what had become of the absent contract with the Chicago Sugar Refining Company. Counsel for the complainants exhibited to the witness certain copies of deeds from the Chicago Sugar Refining Company to Edwin L. Johnson, and from said Johnson to the Glucose Sugar Refining Company, dated, respectively, August 7 and 9, 1897, and inquired of the witness what he had had to do with the execution and delivery of the deeds, with a view of showing the price at which the plant of the Chicago Sugar Refining Company had been sold, to wit, $6,250,000, and for the purpose of showing that the sale took place as a part of the same transaction, which involved a sale of the plant of the American Glucose Company; but the court refused to allow the witness to testify upon the matters thus inquired about. Counsel for complainants also offered in evidence, with the several option contracts, certain assignments attached thereto showing assignments of said contracts by the bank, the vendee therein, to Edwin L. Johnson; but the court refused to admit said assignments, and also refused to admit in evidence certified copies of said deeds.

The court, upon objection by Wilson that the evidence was incompetent and immaterial, refused to allow the witness Matthieson to state where the money came from to pay the Chicago Sugar Refining Company for its plant, or to state whether or not the money was that of the Illinois Trust & Savings Bank, or of Johnson, the grantee in the deed, or of the Glucose Sugar Refining Company; or to state how many deeds he received for the plants of the six corporations, as pre-dent of the Glucose Sugar Refining Company, on August 11 and 12, 1897; or whether the transactions on August 11 and 12, 1897, with the six corporations, were carried out in his presence, at the same time, or not. The court, also, upon similar objections by Wilson, refused to allow the witness to state, in answer to questions by counsel for appellants, whether it was the understanding and agreement by the six corporations with the Glucose Sugar Refining Company that the conveyances and sales were to be carried out at the same time; or whether the properties were first deeded to Johnson, and then by Johnson to the Glucose Sugar Refining Company; or whether the six plants described in the option contracts are now in the possession of the Glucose Sugar Refining Company; or whether witness was in the management and control of the six corporations, as president of the Glucose Sugar Refining Company; or why the option contracts were taken to the Illinois Trust & Savings Bank for the sale of the plants of the six corporations; or whether the witness or his company fixed the price for glucose in the Chicago market, or the price at which the products of these six plants were sold in Chicago and elsewhere; or what was the price of glucose on April 1, 1897, on May 19, 1897, on June 9, 1897, on August 3, 1897; or whether the six plants in question had been competitors in the sale of glucose; or whether or not any stock of the Glucose Sugar Refining Company was used to buy either of the six plants; or whether or not the money to pay for the plant of the American Glucose Company was obtained from subscriptions under the underwriters' agreement in New York; or the price at which the several plants were bought by the Glucose Sugar Refining Company; or how the price, at which the several plants as described in the several option contracts were bought, was paid, whether in money or in stock; or whether the proceeds of the underwriters' agreement were ever given to Edwin L. Johnson, or ever used by him to pay for the several plants; or whether the money paid for the American Glucose plant was received from Johnson; or what dividends had been paid by the Glucose Sugar Refining Company; or whether the Glucose Sugar Refining Company sold its glucose with reference to rebates; or whether the said company had a rebate agreement. The witness was then shown a paper, over the signature of the Glucose Sugar Refining Company, dated September 23, 1897, addressed "to the trade," and stating: "You are hereby notified that on and after September 27, 1897, a rebate of one-quarter per cent per pound will be paid six months after purchase to all buyers of glucose and grape sugar who shall comply with the terms of purchase, and who shall buy glucose and grape sugar exclusively of the Glucose Sugar Refining Company. A memorandum voucher will be furnished each customer entitled to said rebate, and his certificate, stating that he has complied with the conditions governing said rebate, will be required." But the witness was not allowed to state whether his company had issued to the trade the paper shown to him; or to state whether, as president of the Glucose Sugar Refining Company, he had received, and had on hand out of these rebates, a sum approximating $1,000,000, so as to control the parties dealing in glucose, and compel them to buy of his company; or whether or not any part of the purchase price of the six plants was paid in the stock of the Glucose Sugar Refining Company, either to the corporation, or to the stockholders of the old corporation.

After hearing had upon the evidence taken as aforesaid, the court, on June 23, 1898, decreed that the bill, as amended, should be dismissed for want of equity. The present writ of error is sued out for the purpose of reviewing the decree of the circuit court which so dismissed the amended bill for want of equity.

Mr. William J. Ammen, for plaintiffs in error:

The combination was in contravention of public policy, and illegal and void.

The bill does not show that a trust or monopoly contrary to statutory prohibitions was established or contemplated. The act of 1891 does not apply, because there was no allegation or proof of a combination to fix prices or to limit production, as is required by that act.

Messrs. Thomas A. Moran and John J. Herrick, for Glucose Sugar Refining Company:

Where at the time a bill is filed there is an existing executory contract for the sale of the property involved, although the contract has not been consummated, the vendee in such contract should be made a party defendant; and, if he is not, and subsequently the purchase is completed by the payment of the purchase money and the delivery of the deed, the deed will not be defeated under the doctrine of lis pendens.

Magruder, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The bill in this case is filed by a stockholder in the American Glucose Company, a corporation organized under the laws of New Jersey, but doing business and owning property at Peoria, in Illinois. The stockholder who files the bill is a citizen of Illinois. The American Glucose Company owned a plant, consisting of real estate, together with the buildings and machinery located thereon, and also personal property, in the city of Peoria, in Illinois. The land upon which the plant is situated is specifically described in the bill. The primary object of the bill, and the chief relief sought by it, are to prevent the officers and directors of the American Glucose Company from selling and disposing of its plant in Peoria, and from closing out the business, in which it is there engaged, of manufacturing glucose and grape sugar. The bill charges that the officers and directors of the corporation have been squandering its assets by diverting the profits made in its business to their own use; and that in further consummation of their fraudulent disposition of the property of the company, they are about to make a sale of the manufacturing plant in Peoria to a new corporation organized under the laws of New Jersey, and to give up and abandon the business of the company as theretofore conducted in Peoria. The bill further charges that not only is the American Glucose Company about to make a sale of its plant to the new corporation, but that five other corporations, engaged in the same business of manufacturing glucose and grape sugar, are about to make sales of their respective plants to the same newly organized corporation; that all of said sales constitute one transaction; and that the sale of the American Glucose Company is merely a part of that transaction. It is charged in the bill that the arrangement, by which the proposed new corporation is to take conveyances of all these plants, constitutes a giant pool, trust, or combine, formed for the purpose of regulating, fixing, and controlling the prices of glucose and grape sugar, and of suppressing competition in the manufacture thereof, and of creating a monopoly therein.

1. Shortly after the filing of the bill, on August 3, 1897, the American Glucose Company and William Hamlin, president thereof, and Cicero J. Hamlin and Harry Hamlin, directors and officers thereof, and all other directors and officers and stockholders thereof (except appellants), filed their answers to the bill. These answers were subsequently withdrawn, but not until June 22, 1898, while the cause was on hearing before the circuit court. Replications were filed to these answers, and an issue of fact was thus made upon the allegations of the bill, which set up the formation of an illegal trust or combine. Upon the issue of fact as to the purchases of the plants of other corporations than the American Glucose Company, with a view of forming an illegal trust, and crushing out competition, and creating a monopoly in the manufacture of glucose and grape sugar, testimony was taken on behalf of the complainants in the bill. We are unable to see why the consideration of the facts as developed by this testimony is not necessarily involved in the decision of this case by this court, notwithstanding the insistence by one of the counsel for defendants in error in his brief that "no discussion of any evidence, or pretended evidence, in relation thereto, is proper in this court." It is true that, upon the hearing of the cause, the American Glucose Company, and its officers and directors and majority stockholders, withdrew their answers, and permitted a default and decree pro confesso to be entered against them. This action on their part was a confession of the truth of all the allegations of the bill, which they had answered and put at issue. But the proof, taken in support of those allegations, was not thereby necessarily withdrawn from the consideration of the court in passing upon the issues involved in the case. Section 18 of the chancery act provides that, "where a bill is taken for confessed, the court, before a final decree is made, if deemed requisite, may require the complainant to produce documents and witnesses to prove the allegations of his bill, or may examine him on oath or affirmation, touching the facts therein alleged. Such decree shall be made in either case as the court shall consider equitable and proper." 1 Starr & C. Anno. Stat. p. 401, chap. 22. Here the court did not require the complainants below to introduce proof to sustain the allegations of their bill, but the complainants had the right, even before issue joined, to take depositions to substantiate the averments of their bill. Doyle v. Wiley, 15 Ill. 576. Certainly, they had a right to do so, after issue was joined. It being a matter of discretion with the court, even after default, to require proofs of the averments of the bill, it may be that if the complainants, on being required by the court to do so, should fail to comply, their bill might be properly dismissed for want of such proofs. But the general rule is that, where a bill is sufficient on its face to sustain the contention of the complainants therein, and to entitle them to the relief prayed for, a decree dismissing the bill for want of equity should not be entered in favor of defendants, who, by their defaults, have confessed the bill. Hoffman v. Schoyer, 143 Ill. 598, 28 N. E. 823. In the present case, the court below dismissed the bill as to the defaulted defendants, as well as to the other defendants. This action of the court was, in our opinion, erroneous, not only because the bill was sufficient to justify the relief prayed for, but because its material allegations were sustained by the proofs. This proof was clearly applicable to the actions taken in the premises by the American Glucose Company and its officers and directors and majority stockholders, who answered the bill. Whether such proof is binding upon the Glucose Sugar Refining Company, holding from and under the American Glucose Company, will be considered hereafter.

As, therefore, the proof is before us in the record, and the case is one of great importance, we deem it our duty, before discussing the questions of law arising out of the demurrer or demurrers to the whole bill or to parts thereof, to examine the testimony upon the issue of fact made by the answers filed.

In the spring of 1897 six corporations were engaged in the manufacture of glucose,—two of them in the state of Iowa, and four of them in the state of Illinois. They were the Chicago Sugar Refining Company, operating in the city of Chicago; the American Glucose Company, operating in the city of Peoria; the Peoria Grape Sugar Company, also operating in the city of Peoria; the Rockford Sugar Refining Company, operating in Rockford, Illinois; the American Preservers' Company, otherwise spoken of as the Davenport Sugar Refining Company, operating at Davenport, Iowa; and the Firmenich Manufacturing Company, operating at Marshalltown, Iowa. There was another manufactory of glucose at St. Charles, Illinois, known as the St. Charles Glucose Company, operated by one Charles Pope, of St. Charles and Chicago. Pope refused to enter the combination hereinafter mentioned at the outset, and is spoken of by some of the witnesses as an "awkward" competitor. The Pope manufactory, however, was of small capacity compared with the others. All of these corporations, thus engaged in the manufacture of glucose and grape sugar, were competitors with each other in that business. The proof shows that glucose cannot be successfully manufactured except in what is known as the corn belt of the United States, including the states of Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, Missouri, and parts of Nebraska, South Dakota, Kentucky, and Indiana. The corn belt constitutes an ellipse of about 950 miles in length from east to west, and about 700 miles in width, with Peoria as the geographical center, and all within 1,000 miles of Chicago. The products of glucose are extensively used, and it is an important constituent in the matter of making table syrups, jellies, and jams, and is also used in the manufacture of beers and wines and cordials. The manufacturing, as above named, consumed a little more than 100,000 bushels of corn daily in the manufacture of their products. The American Glucose Company consumed daily about 26,000 bushels of corn; the Chicago Sugar Refining Company consumed in said manufacture about 26,000 bushels of corn daily; the Peoria Grape Sugar Company, which was, however, slightly crippled by a fire consuming part of its plant, consumed therein about 15,000 bushels of corn daily; the Rockford Sugar Refining Company consumed about 16,000 bushels of corn daily; the Davenport Sugar Refining Company, or the American Preservers' Company, consumed about 9,000 bushels of corn daily; and the Firmenich Manufacturing Company consumed about 9,000 bushels of corn daily. The capacity of the Pope Manufacturing Company was about 6,000 or 7,000 bushels of corn daily.

Some time in May, 1897, as nearly as we can gather from the record, a scheme was formed for the purpose of uniting all these corporations in one ownership. The plants, including both real and personal property, so far as they were engaged in the manufacture of glucose and grape sugar, were to be transferred by these corporations, respectively, to a new corporation to be organized under the laws of New Jersey. Such corporation was not organized completely until August 2, 1897. Its charter, or certificate of organization, bears date August 2, 1897, though it would appear that it did not go into practical operation until August 3, 1897, or shortly thereafter. The parties, who were engaged in forming, promoting, carrying out, and consummating the scheme for the consolidation of the property interests of all of said corporations, were principally the officers, directors, attorneys, and majority stockholders in the old corporations, respectively. Nearly all of them, if not all of them, were citizens of Illinois. The principal persons engaged in forming and consummating this consolidation were Norman B. Ream and John W. Doane, who were largely interested in the Rockford Company, above mentioned; William Hamlin, the president of the American Glucose Company; Conrad H. Matthieson, of the Chicago Sugar Refining Company; two Chicago lawyers, named John P. Wilson and 64 L. R. A.

Levy Mayer, Wilson being also a stockholder in the Chicago Sugar Refining Company; William H. Henkel, secretary of the Illinois Trust & Savings Bank of Chicago; and one J. B. Greenhut. Norman B. Ream was a director in the Illinois Trust & Savings Bank of Chicago. Between the early part of May, 1897, and August 11 or 12, 1897, all the plants above mentioned, except that of Pope, belonging to the six corporations hereinbefore described, were transferred to the Glucose Sugar Refining Company of New Jersey; and said plants since August 12, 1897, have been in the possession of, and operated by, the Glucose Sugar Refining Company of New Jersey. After August 7, 1897, they ceased to be operated by the respective corporations theretofore owning them. As we understand the evidence, these six corporations were, with the exception of the Pope manufactory at St. Charles, Illinois, the only manufacturing engaged in the manufacture and sale of glucose and grape sugar within the limits of the corn belt already described. The negotiations and transactions, leading to the result thus accomplished, were conducted secretly and with great caution. The organization of the new corporation, which was to be vested with the title to the plants, was deferred until the last moment, and was not consummated until the day before, or the day on which, the present bill was filed.

The general method adopted for the consolidation of these properties was substantially as follows: Option contracts were drawn up, one for each of the corporations already mentioned. By the terms of these option contracts, which were made between each of said corporations on the one part, and the Illinois Trust & Savings Bank of Chicago on the other, the corporation agreed to sell all its real and personal property and plant, and leaseholds, machinery, easements, buildings, fixtures, and utensils, located at the place at which it was engaged in the manufacture of glucose, together with its good will, trade rights, trademarks, and the right to use its patents, to the bank, upon the request of the bank, or its transferee, provided such request should be made before August 15, 1897. The option contract between the Firmenich Manufacturing Company of Iowa, and the Illinois Trust & Savings Bank, of Chicago, was dated May 24, 1897; the contract between the Rockford Sugar Refining Company, Limited, of Illinois, and the bank was dated May 25, 1897; the contract between the Chicago Sugar Refining Company, of Illinois, and the bank, and that between the Peoria Grape Sugar Company and the bank, were dated June 7, 1897. There are two contracts between the American Preservers' Company, of West Virginia, and the bank, one dated June 3, 1897, and the other dated July 19, 1897, the latter recited to be a substitute for the former. The second contract between the American Glucose Company of New Jersey and the bank was dated June 9, 1897. Some of these contracts state that a part of the purchase money for the plant and property to be sold is to be paid in the stock of a corporation with a capital stock of $40,000,000, of which $14,000,000, is to be preferred stock, and $26,000,000 common stock, which said corporation is about to be organized and to acquire said property, and also the properties specified in the contracts made between the five other corporations and the bank. Some of these contracts provide that the bank may pay for the property, at its option, in the stock of the new corporation to be formed, instead of cash. The contracts also contain a provision by the terms of which the vendor corporation and its officers agree not to buy or sell or manufacture glucose, or its kindred products or by-products, for a certain term of years, within 1,000 miles of Chicago; the said term of years being three years in some instances, and twenty-five years in at least one instance. The defendant in error the Glucose Sugar Refining Company of New Jersey, a corporation which was to be organized according to the terms of these option contracts, and which was finally organized as above stated, is a corporation whose certificate of organization provides that it shall have power to conduct business throughout the United States and all foreign countries, with the object of manufacturing and selling glucose, and buying and selling corn, and all its products and by-products, and similar articles of merchandise, and to transport the same, and to do all lawful business incidental thereto; and said certificate further provides that the total amount of the stock shall be $40,000,000, of $100 per share; $14,000,000 to be preferred stock, and $26,000,000 common stock, etc.

The first option contract made between the defendant in error the American Glucose Company and the Illinois Trust & Savings Bank was dated May 19, 1897. Thereby the American Glucose Company agreed to sell to the bank its plant, etc., for $1,750,000, one third in cash, and the balance to be paid by notes secured by mortgage on the property. It further provides that "it is the purpose of the bank, or of those for whom it acts, to organize a corporation, under the laws of one of the states of the Union, for the purpose of operating this plant." The contract of May 19th further provides that an exhibit of the new corporation and its means shall be made to the president of the American Glucose Company, and then proceeds as follows: "If he [said president] be satisfied with the nature and extent of the property so owned, or if it be the property which has been verbally stated to him will be acquired by such corporation, then $600,000 in amount at par of the preferred stock of such corporation, out of a total issue not exceeding $14,000,000, and $850,000 in amount at par in the common stock of such corporation, out of a total issue not exceeding $26,000,000, shall be lodged with such president, and this stock shall be held as an additional collateral security for the payment of such notes and each thereof," etc. This agreement of May 19th also provides that the bank is to purchase all the supplies and material on hand belonging to the American Glucose Company, and is to assume all the bona fide contracts made by the company in due course of business. It also provides that the company, and its officers and directors, including the Hamlins, shall bind themselves to the corporation not to buy or sell glucose within 1,000 miles of Chicago. An unsigned copy of this contract is in the record. The contract of May 19, 1897, was not signed by the bank, and it is claimed by William Hamlin, the president of the American Glucose Company, that it was not signed by that company. We think, however, that it was signed by the American Glucose Company, as it was originally drawn. A new option contract for the sale of its property to the bank, bearing date June 9, 1897, was executed by the American Glucose Company, by William H. Hamlin, its president, as a substitute, as is alleged, for the contract of May 19, 1897; and it makes the following recital in the eleventh paragraph, to wit: "This agreement is in lieu of, and in substitution for, a certain other option, bearing date the 19th day of May last, which was executed by the glucose company, running to the bank, and which was delivered to J. B. Greenhut," etc. The option agreement of June 9, 1897, fixes the price of the realty of the American Glucose Company at $1,750,000, and its section 6 provides that the American Glucose Company and the Hamlins are not to make or buy or sell glucose for five years within 1,000 miles of Chicago.

The agreement of June 9, 1897, is claimed by plaintiffs in error to be a contract of sale to the bank of the property of the American Glucose Company for cash, and it is contended that all the provisions for the taking of stock in the new corporation to be organized, either as purchase money, or as collateral to notes given as purchase money, were eliminated. The evidence certainly shows that many of the officers and stockholders in the corporations which sold their plants to the new corporations held stock in the latter after the transfer of the plants to it. William Hamlin and Harry Hamlin both held stock in the Glucose Sugar Refining Company at a date subsequent to the delivery of the deed which conveyed to that company the plant of the American Glucose Company. It is a fair conclusion from the testimony that the purchases of many of the six plants were paid for, either in whole or in part, by the stock of the new company. An instance of testimony of this kind is furnished by the letter of June 21, 1897, written by Levy Mayer to William Hamlin, and Hamlin's reply thereto, dated June 22, 1897. That letter and reply are as follows:

"First. You will underwrite $500,000, taking $500,000 preferred stock and about 143 per cent additional common, and will make a contract with a responsible party by which, in effect, you are to have the right to 'put' the amount so underwritten within a year, and the other parties to have the right to 'call' that amount within the same time, the purchase price to be the amount to pay for the underwriting and 6 per cent additional. This arrangement to be embodied in a contract which shall be legally enforceable. Second. You will underwrite an additional $500,000 upon a basis say of 50 per cent, you to get the $500,000 preferred stock and about 143 per cent additional common stock, and to make a contract by which the second party is to have the right, within one year, to purchase of you this $500,000 so underwritten, and to receive from you the $500,000 preferred stock, and 143 per cent common stock, and to pay the price you paid therefor,—that is to say, 50 per cent, or $250,000, and 6 per cent interest thereon; you to have no right to 'put,' but the other party to have the right to 'call.' All this to be embodied in a contract legally enforceable." The letter then adds, viz.: "Should what I state here be in any way different from your understanding of the facts, I shall be glad if you will send me a line putting me right."

Buffalo, N. Y., June 22, 1897.

Mr. Levy Mayer,

811-839 Unity Building, Chicago, Ill.

Dear Sir:—

Your favor of the 21st inst. is this morning received. Your understanding of my proposition to underwrite, as therein expressed, is correct in every particular. You will remember that you said on Saturday that a "put and call" arrangement, such as I have suggested, would not be legal in Illinois, and that you did not know whether it would be in New York state or not. At this writing I have had no legal advice upon the subject.

Yours very truly,

William Hamlin.

June 9th, when the last option contract of the American Glucose Company with the bank was executed by that company, Hamlin proposed to underwrite more than $1,000,000 of stock in the new corporation to be formed. He says that the proposition to take this stock was made on behalf of the company, and would inure to the benefit of the stockholders. But whether the plant of the American Glucose Company was paid for in cash, or in stock of the Glucose Sugar Refining Company, makes no practical difference. The purchase of the plant of the American Glucose Company was a part of the single transaction, which involved the purchase, at one and the same time, of the plants of all the six corporations. This was well known to William Hamlin, president of the American Glucose Company. He knew, and was informed by letters from the promoters of the transaction, that they were trying to purchase or secure the property of the other five companies. He also knew that the purchase of the other properties and the organization of the new corporation would not be effected or accomplished, unless there was at the same time a transfer of the property of the American Glucose Company. The parties organizing the combination refused to consummate it, unless Hamlin would bring into the combination the property of the American Glucose Company. Money and subscriptions were secured upon the faith of the option contract executed by Hamlin for the American Glucose Company, and deposited with the Illinois Trust & Savings Bank, on account of the belief by the parties paying such money and subscriptions, that the American Glucose Company was to be a party to the combination.

That all the corporations acted together in the matter is shown clearly by the correspondence, including the letters of the attorneys, and by the facts that the option contracts of all the companies were delivered at the same time to the same repository, to wit, the bank, to be transferred by the bank as the promoters of the scheme should direct, and by the further fact that all the deeds conveying the several properties to the new corporation were executed about the same time, and delivered simultaneously.

On June 11, 1897, John P. Wilson, Levy Mayer, and J. B. Greenhut, over their own signatures, addressed and delivered to the Illinois Trust & Savings Bank of Chicago a written communication, by the terms of which they deposited with the bank the six option contracts, executed by the six corporations, respectively, and by the terms of which it was agreed to sell their respective properties to the bank; and in said written communication after describing the contracts, the following statements were made, to wit: "All of the said contracts are deposited with you on the following conditions: First, you shall hold, transfer, assign, or otherwise dispose of all of the said contracts in such way, and in such way only, as you shall be directed to do by the joint order in writing of the undersigned; second, unless you shall receive the joint order to the contrary thereof before August 16, 1897, you are authorized, upon the request of said parties to said contract, to surrender and deliver to said respective first parties their respective contracts." Below the signatures of Wilson, Mayer, and Greenhut the Illinois Trust & Savings Bank, by William Henkel, its secretary, wrote the following, to wit: "The undersigned hereby acknowledges the receipt of all the contracts mentioned in the foregoing instrument, and hereby agrees to hold said contracts subject to the conditions and provisions specified in said foregoing instrument."

The option contracts, thus deposited with the Illinois Trust & Savings Bank, remained with that bank until about August 5, 1897, or a few days thereafter. Let us see what was done in the meantime. On July 15, 1897, Levy Mayer telegraphed to William Hamlin, president of the American Glucose Company, to send abstract of title, and in his telegram added the following words: "Deal closed. Keep strictly confidential." About the same time Mayer wrote to Hamlin, acknowledging the receipt of a letter and telegram from him in regard to notice of a stockholders' meeting thereafter to be held, in which letter Mayer says: "The Davenport Company, I am satisfied, for legal reasons, could not be legally shut down, owing to the fact that its plant is in possession of its lessee, the Davenport Syrup Refining Company, which latter has a number of substantial contracts yet to be filled. I succeeded, however, in making very satisfactory arrangement, by which it will be optional to the new company to take over outstanding contracts and to purchase undelivered produce on hand. May I trouble you to send me, as soon as possible, accurate memoranda of the improvements, and contracts for improvements, etc., which under your contract you will ask the new company to assume."

On July 17, 1897, Mayer sent to William Hamlin, president of the American Glucose Company, at Buffalo, New York, the following telegram: "Letter received. Matter has reached a point where its consummation is a certainty. It has been financed successfully and most satisfactorily, as you will agree when you learn details. If your counsel thinks stockholders' meeting necessary, please have same called to-day. A day or two is of the greatest service to me at this time. In your notice of meeting, please state no more than is legally requisite. Am procuring the consent of different companies to shut down. Chicago, Peoria, Rockford, have agreed to do so at once. Firmenich has agreed to do so not later than next Saturday. Am now negotiating with Davenport in that direction. Would like you to do as we have done." To this telegram from Mayer, Hamlin sent the following telegram in reply: "We will do everything to facilitate you. Works stopped grinding Thursday on account of coal strike."

Can there be any doubt, after reading these letters and telegrams, that these parties were engaged in a scheme to have all the six corporations shut down their manufactories and abandon their business? Can there be any doubt that Hamlin, president of the American Glucose Company, knew that the other corporations were shutting down their plants with a view to conveying them to a new corporation, and that, in transferring the plant of his own company, he was aiding the consolidation of all the properties in one giant trust? It must be remembered, in this connection, that preparations were all the time going on for the organization of the new corporation, and that this new corporation was organized on August 2 or 3, 1897, and took possession of and commenced operating all the plants of the six corporations, which had suspended business, on and after August 12, 1897. But this is not all. On July 19, 1897, the board of directors of the American Glucose Company made and passed a resolution, which is set out in full in the statement preceding this opinion, wherein it was resolved that it was advisable to relinquish the business of manufacturing glucose and grape sugar, and such other business as it was engaged in at Peoria; and wherein it was resolved that the nature of its business should be changed, and that its plant and property in Peoria should be sold, and that its manufacturing should be thereafter confined to the manufacture of starch in Buffalo; and that a meeting of stockholders should be called to take place in Buffalo on August 3, 1897; and to which resolution was attached a notice, signed by George W. Lamb, secretary, that the meeting would so be held at the office in Buffalo on August 3, 1897, for the purposes specified in the resolution. On July 23, 1897, John P. Wilson wrote the following letter to William Hamlin: "In the matter of the proposed sale of the plant of the American Glucose Company at Peoria, under the contract heretofore executed between said company and the Illinois Trust & Savings Bank, I beg leave to say that all the arrangements have been perfected by the proposed purchasers to complete the purchase and pay for the plant within the time limited by said contract. The uncertainty as to the date of closing the purchase lies in the fact that a number of properties are under contract, the purchase of all of which had to be completed simultaneously. We have not yet received the abstracts of title to some of these plants. These abstracts of title will have to be examined, and the titles to all of the plants proposed to be purchased approved, before the transaction can be closed, as it is a single transaction." If this letter, written by the attorney who was most active in promoting and carrying out the scheme for the consolidation of these properties, does not show that the several purchases of all the plants were to be made simultaneously, and together constituted a single transaction, then we fail to understand the meaning of the English language.

On July 26, 1897, Mayer wrote to Hamlin as follows: "I thank you for your very kind letter of the 24th inst. I hope to be able to arrange matters so that the recent destruction by fire to one of the buildings of the Peoria Grape Sugar Company will not interfere with the pending arrangements for the purchase of its property by the new glucose company. My address in New York will be Savoy Hotel, or American Spirits Manufacturing Company, Mills Building." On the same day Mayer wrote to Hamlin in reference to the salaries to be paid by the new company to Henry E. Grant, treasurer, and George W. Lamb, secretary, of the American Glucose Company, as follows: "Under existing contracts, the time has arrived to determine, as I am advised, what arrangements can be made with your Messrs. Grant and Lamb. As I am told, neither Mr. Grant nor Lamb seems to be satisfied with the amounts offered; Mr. Grant suggesting that he should receive $25,000 a year, and Mr. Lamb $10,000 a year. It is, however, important that the new company should, if possible, secure the services of those gentlemen mentioned at salaries not exceeding those fixed by Mr. Matthieson. It is therefore now opportune for you to undertake the office of negotiating, if possible, with Messrs. Grant and Lamb, so that contracts as contemplated can be secured from them."

On July 27, 1897, Mayer wrote to Franklin B. Locke, of Buffalo, an attorney and a director for many years of the American Glucose Company, the following letter: "You ask for the name of the grantee. That has not yet been positively determined, though it is very probable that the name will be 'United States Glucose Company.' This matter will be determined, in all probability, some time this week, when it is expected to apply for the charter. The new company will be organized under the laws of New Jersey. It is our intention to have printed contracts uniform, as near as possible, for execution by the different officers of the vendor companies." On the same day, Locke wrote to Mayer as follows: "I now hand you draft of the little agreement promised yesterday. If satisfactory, kindly O. K. it, and return it to me, so that I can have it executed upon being advised of the formation of the new corporation."

The letters thus quoted not only show that the contracts of sale to be executed by the various corporations, selling their properties, were to be uniform in their terms, but also show that the new company was to silence opposition, as well as competition, by providing places for the officers of the old companies, and by taking from them contracts not thereafter to engage in the manufacture of glucose. The above letter from Locke to Mayer refers to an agreement under which the Hamlins stipulated not to engage in the business of manufacturing glucose for a certain number of years. This transaction is thus brought within the scathing condemnation of the Supreme Court of the United States in United States v. Trans-Missouri Freight Asso. 166 U. S. 290, 41 L. ed. 1007, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 540, where it was held not to be "for the substantial interests of the country that any one commodity should be within the sole power, and subject to the sole will, of one powerful combination of capital;" and where it was held to be unfortunate for the country to deprive it "of the services of a large number of small, but independent, dealers;" and where it was held to be "not for the real prosperity of any country that such changes should occur which result in transferring an independent business man, the head of his establishment, small though it might be, into a mere servant or agent of a corporation for selling the commodities which he once manufactured or dealt in, having no voice in shaping the business policy of the company, and bound to obey orders issued by others."

About this time, or shortly before this time, Mayer wrote a letter to Hamlin as to the insurance policies upon the property, asking for information in regard to the same, "so that, when the transfers are made to the new company, no time may be lost." He also wrote the following letter: "I want to say that I find on my return this afternoon that the matter is progressing to my entire satisfaction, and I have no doubt whatever that all the transactions can be completed unless some hitch should occur by reason of some defect in the titles, the abstracts of which are now being either brought down to date or examined. Some three have already been completed and delivered to us, and the others are being hastened forward to be completed. We are still waiting for your abstract."

On July 28, 1897, Hamlin wrote to Mayer as follows: "Mr. Grant's connection with us has given him perfect satisfaction in the past, is satisfactory to him now, and his contract insures him a comfortable living for five years to come. We are satisfied with the contract and intend to carry it out to the letter, unless at his request, it be terminated before its natural expiration. We feel that some line of business not in competition with the new glucose company will soon be thought of by us in which Mr. Grant's knowledge and abilities will not only enable us to secure satisfactory returns, but will provide him with agreeable occupation and assure him fair pecuniary returns. The price for his services that he named to Mr. Matthieson, while very much in excess of the contract price with us, is not so unreasonable as it might seem at the first blush. In my judgment, Mr. Grant is more responsible than any other individual for the condition of affairs that rendered it possible for all parties to give favorable consideration to the consolidation plan. I will do that which I can fairly to promote his interests and those of the new company."

On July 29, 1897, John P. Wilson wrote to Locke as follows: "Will you kindly leave the name of the grantee in the contract blank for the present, and I will wire you the name of the grantee in ample time to be inserted before execution." In one of his letters written at this time, William Hamlin says: "Under Mr. Grant's management, the capacity of the work was increased over 50 per cent to 22,000 or 23,000 bushels. The increase of capacity, attended by a process that lessened the cost, enabled the American Glucose Company to produce its products and to sell them at a price that made the business, as a whole, unprofitable, in my opinion, to its competitors. We had lessened the cost of the labor and the cost of fuel, and increased the quantity, and bettered the quality, of the main and by products."

On August 2, 1897, Wilson wrote to Locke as follows: "Might it not be well to keep the meeting of board of directors and stockholders alive by adjournment, so that, if any question should arise requiring action, the same might be speedily taken?"

On August 3, 1897, Mayer wrote William Hamlin as follows: "I find that during my absence all the moneys necessary to complete the purchase of the properties by the new company have been paid to the Illinois Trust & Savings Bank and are now awaiting distribution. While east, the charter of new company was prepared, and was yesterday filed for record at Trenton, so that the new company, the Glucose Sugar Refining Company, is now in actual existence. The abstracts of title to the six properties have been furnished and have been examined. As you can well imagine, in a deal of this magnitude there are a large number of details to be looked after, as well as instruments to transfer and other contracts to be executed and delivered. These contracts must necessarily all be delivered contemporaneously. We shall be able to begin to close the transaction this coming Thursday morning at 10 o'clock, and hope to be able to conclude the entire work during that day, if possible. It is therefore necessary that all of the parties in interest should be in this city at the hour indicated." In reply to this letter, Mayer received the following telegram from Hamlin on August 4, 1897: "I will call on you at your office to-morrow morning."

On August 3, 1897, the meeting of the stockholders of the American Glucose Company was called pursuant to the notice already mentioned. At that meeting, George F. Harding, one of the plaintiffs in error and the stockholder who filed this bill, and who had theretofore written several letters to officers of the American Glucose Company, but had failed to obtain any definite or reliable information as to the proposed sale of the company's plant, made a motion that the stockholders of the company should refuse to ratify the alleged contract for the sale of the Peoria plant of the company to the glucose trust or corporation, or its representative, upon the grounds that the sale was unlawful, as being prohibited by the statute against trusts of the state of Illinois; and that the creation of a trust in glucose by contract with the company for the purchase and sale of a necessary element in the unlawful combination by such sale was in violation of the powers of the company as given by its charter; and that the contract to relinquish the right to manufacture glucose was against both the right, interests, and powers of the company; and that the price named and made in the offer was grossly inadequate; and that it was not within the powers or duties of the president of the company to make the sale.

At this stage of the proceedings, and upon this date, to wit, August 3, 1897, the original bill in this case was filed, and an injunction was obtained. The new company, the Glucose Sugar Refining Company, had only come into existence on the day before the bill was filed. All the proceedings which are now to be detailed occurred after the filing of the bill in this case, and, inasmuch as the American Glucose Company, was served with summons August 3, 1897, the transfers and other transactions hereinafter mentioned were made and took place pendente lite.

By an instrument in writing, dated August 5, 1897, signed by John P. Wilson, Levy Mayer, and J. B. Greenhut, and concurred in in writing on August 7, 1897, by Edwin L. Johnson, hereinafter named, and addressed to the Illinois Trust & Savings bank of Chicago, the bank was designated as the party of the second part in the option contracts, heretofore referred to and made by the six corporations already named; and said communication to the bank recited that all of said contracts had been deposited by Wilson, Mayer, and Greenhut with the bank, to be held, transferred, and disposed of by it subject to their joint order; and that, in and by all said contracts, it was understood and agreed that the same might be transferred and assigned by the bank; and that, when so transferred and assigned, the said contracts, respectively, and all of their respective parts or provisions, should inure to the bank, and should run in favor of, and be obligatory upon, its transferee, and be of the same purport and effect as though such transferee had originally been made second party to the said contracts, respectively; and it was further therein recited that it was in all said contracts further provided that, in case of said transfer and assignment by the bank, all of its rights, as well as said obligations under said contracts, respectively, whatever the same might be, should forthwith cease and terminate; and after such recitals the said Wilson, Mayer, and Greenhut therein requested that, pursuant to the terms of all said contracts, respectively, the bank should forthwith, by proper instruction, transfer and assign all said contracts, respectively, to Edwin L. Johnson, of Chicago, and all of said contracts when so transferred and assigned by it to Johnson, should inure to his benefit, and run in favor of, and be obligatory upon, him, to the same purport and effect as though he had originally been made the second party to said contracts respectively.

The Illinois Trust & Savings Bank of Chicago was a corporation organized under the laws of Illinois for the purpose of doing a banking business and had no power under its charter to purchase the plants and properties of corporations engaged in the manufacture of glucose and grape sugar. Therefore the option contracts providing for a sale of these properties to the bank, were absolutely void. It does not appear that the contracts were signed by the bank, but, when signed by or for the respective corporations, they were accepted and held by the bank. The bank claims that these contracts were delivered to it to hold in 64 L. R. A.

escrow, and that it merely acted for the parties as the repository or custodian of these contracts, subject to be disposed of as the parties might order. The proof tends to sustain the contention of the bank that it was a mere repository of the papers. It went further, however, in its assistance of these parties to carry out their scheme, than merely to act as custodian of the papers.

Attached to each contract of sale was a written assignment thereof by the bank to Edwin L. Johnson, who therein accepts the assignment, and assumes all the obligations created by the contract in favor of the bank. These written assignments, signed by the bank and Johnson, appear to have been dated August 9, 1897, except the assignment on the contract of the American Glucose Company, which was dated August 11, 1897. At least two of the contracts thus signed provided that the proposed corporation should be organized in such state, and in such manner, as should be satisfactory to John P. Wilson and Levy Mayer.

A deed dated August 7, 1897, was executed by the American Glucose Company, by William Hamlin, its president, conveying the plant of the company in Peoria to Edwin L. Johnson, of Chicago, for an expressed consideration of $1,750,000, which deed was recorded on August 12, 1897. A deed dated August 9, 1897, was executed by Edwin L. Johnson conveying the said plant in Peoria to the Glucose Sugar Refining Company of New Jersey for an expressed consideration of $10, and other good and valuable considerations, which deed was also recorded on August 12, 1897. A deed dated August 7, 1897, was executed by the Chicago Sugar Refining Company, conveying to said Johnson its plant in Chicago, and the real estate on which it was situated, for an expressed consideration of $6,250,000, which deed was recorded also on August 12, 1897. A deed dated August 9, 1897, was executed by said Johnson, a bachelor, of Chicago, to the Glucose Sugar Refining Company of New Jersey, conveying the same property, in consideration of $10 and other good and valuable considerations. Other deeds were executed by the other corporations to Johnson, and by Johnson to the Glucose Sugar Refining Company. The witnesses testify that these deeds were delivered to the Glucose Sugar Refining Company, or to C. H. Matthieson, its president, simultaneously. The deeds were delivered at the banking office of the Illinois Trust & Savings Bank on the evening of August 11, 1897, at 5:30 o'clock, which was after the regular business hours.

The injunction writ was served upon the American Glucose Company on August 3, 1897, and the injunction was in force until August 11, 1897, when it was dissolved. It will thus be observed that the request of Wilson, Mayer, and Greenhut to the bank to assign the contracts, and the execution of the deeds by the corporations to Johnson, and by Johnson to the Glucose Sugar Refining Company, were all made and effected while the injunction was pending. The option contracts referred to, and the assignments attached thereto, were also delivered by the bank to Johnson on the evening of August 11, 1897, but these and all other papers were at once handed back by Johnson to the bank, and placed in its vaults. Edwin L. Johnson, above referred to, was a clerk in the law office of John P. Wilson. He never paid a dollar for the purchase of the vast properties which were conveyed to him, nor did he receive a dollar when he conveyed these properties to the Glucose Sugar Refining Company. When he signed the deeds, he did not know what he was doing, nor did he know that any deeds were executed to him by these various corporations, nor were any such deeds delivered to him. The testimony of Johnson is in the record, and he says: "I am a clerk in Mr. Wilson's office. . . . Never had any connection in any way with the defendants. . . . Never received a deed from any of them that I know of, nor from the American Glucose Company, nor authorized anyone to receive one for me. Some papers I executed. I don't know whether they were deeds or not. I did not read the papers there. . . . I was acting under instructions of Mr. Wilson. He did not tell me what they were. To my knowledge, I never received any deeds." At the taking of the testimony in this case, Wilson made the following statement, which was taken down by the commissioner, and is in the record: "As to Mr. Johnson's testimony, Mr. Johnson was a clerk in my office, and I stated to him, in connection with the transfer of the titles of the glucose property, that I should like to have the titles taken in his name, and have him make the conveyance to the new company. He consented, and he signed such papers as I presented to him, on my statement that they were all right. His relation was merely acting at my request as the person through whom the title should be conveyed, and having no part in the negotiations whatever. He was present when the deeds were received and delivered, and received the documents. I am not sure whether the deeds passed into his hands, but I think they did, and this was done in his name, with his consent. Mr. Johnson would not be able to state the contents of the documents, not having read them."

Henkel says that all the papers in regard to this transaction, that came into the hands of the bank, were vouched for by Wilson and Mayer; and that, among the paper so handed to the bank and vouched for by Wilson and Mayer, was a written order, signed by Edwin L. Johnson, and indorsed as correct by Wilson and Mayer, dated Chicago, August 10, 1897, and which is in the following words: "I hand you herewith certificates for 34,500 shares of preferred stock, and 49,285³/₄ shares of common stock, of the Glucose Sugar Refining Company of New Jersey, with which to satisfy and cancel the receipts for money received by you under the underwriters' agreement in regard to said company, and request you to turn over and pay out all money so deposited under the underwriters' agreement as follows, namely: To the American Glucose Company of New Jersey, $1,977,000.00; to the American Preservers' Company of West Virginia, $700,000.00; to the Glucose Sugar Refining Company of New Jersey, $773,000.00. The above amounts include two subscriptions, aggregating $75,000.00, upon which you have as yet issued no certificates." What the underwriters' agreement referred to in this order was, the record does not show, as Wilson refused to allow the witnesses to testify in regard to it, and refused to allow it to be produced in evidence. That underwriters' agreement was the authority under which the bank received the money and gave the receipts mentioned in the order. The details in the matter were conducted and arranged with the bank by Wilson and Mayer; but, owing to the refusal of the witness to testify at the suggestion of counsel, it is impossible to state what those details were.

On the evening of August 11, 1897, the officials and representatives of the six corporations entering into the consolidation scheme were present at the Illinois Trust & Savings Bank; and there, upon that occasion, a delivery took place to the parties of the deeds and other documents. A check was there handed to H. E. Grant, treasurer of the American Glucose Company, for $377,000, but not for $1,977,000. The amount named in the order of August 10th, to wit, $1,977,000, exceeded the consideration, to wit, $1,750,000, named in the deed of the American Glucose Company to Johnson, by $227,000. Why the amount named in the deed was thus increased, or what became of the excess does not appear.

It appears in the testimony of H. E. Grant and C. H. Matthieson that in the bank on the evening of August 11, 1897, there were present Matthieson and Wilson, representing the Chicago Sugar Refining Company; Ream, representing the Rockford Company; Best and Krause, representing the American Preservers' Company; Edward Mayer, representing the Peoria Grape Sugar Company; George Firmenich, representing the Firmenich Manufacturing Company; and Grant, representing the American Glucose Company. Grant says: "The deeds were all delivered there at about the same time. I was paid first, delivered my papers, and took my check. I was called by Mr. Henkel, secretary of the bank. He stood in the middle of the room, and called the American Glucose Company. I delivered the papers, took my check, and went out. Don't know who was called next."

An agreement, dated August 11, 1897, the same day on which the delivery of the deeds took place as above stated, was executed between the American Glucose Company, as party of the first part, and the Glucose Sugar Refining Company, as party of the second part, which agreement is as follows: "Whereas, the parties hereto are engaged in the business of manufacturing and selling glucose, grape sugar, starch, and kindred products, and the various products of a glucose factory; and whereas, contemporaneously herewith, the second party has purchased all the real estate, leasehold, buildings, improvements, appurtenances, easements, plant, machinery, fixtures, and utensils belonging to the first party, and situate in the city of Peoria, etc.; and whereas, a valuable and substantial part of the consideration paid by the second party for the property so as aforesaid described was and is the agreement herein contained: "Now, therefore, in consideration of the premises, and of the sum of one dollar ($1.00) and other good and valuable considerations, the first party hereby covenants and agrees with the second party, its successors or assigns, that the first party shall not and will not, at any time during the period of twenty-five years from and after the date hereof, within a radius of 1,500 miles of the city of Chicago, Illinois, engage in the business of buying, manufacturing, or selling glucose, grape sugar, or any of the products now produced by any glucose factory; and the first party shall not, and will not, at any time during said period of twenty-five years from and after the date hereof, use in its starch factory at Buffalo the process commonly known as the 'acid' process, which process is now in general use in glucose factories in this country."

On August 7, 1897, or about that date, the American Glucose Company assigned to Johnson its patents and policies of insurance, and its business and factories at Peoria, and all of its good will, and its business, etc. On August 28, 1897, at a meeting of a majority of the stockholders of the 64 L. R. A.

American Glucose Company at Camden, New Jersey, that company reduced its authorized capital stock from $1,500,000 to $150,000, and its stock actually issued from $1,322,500 to $132,250, and ratified the action taken at the other meeting on August 3, 1897, and ratified the action of the president and directors in selling the plant at Peoria to Edwin L. Johnson, of Chicago. The action taken at Buffalo, New York, on August 3, 1897, was taken in New York by the stockholders of a New Jersey corporation. It has been recognized as a general rule by this court that the power of a corporation to perform corporate acts outside of the state of its creation, and where the laws of its corporate existence have no force, does not exist. Bastian v. Modern Woodmen, 166 Ill. 595, 46 N. E. 1090. As to the attempted ratification of the alleged sale to Edwin L. Johnson, it has already been shown that there was no sale to Johnson.

2. A question of law which arises in the case is whether the facts set up in the bill constitute an illegal trust. The pleadings in the case are in a somewhat singular condition. Some of the defendants answered the bill. One of the defendants to the amended bill filed a paper, which was in part an answer and in part a demurrer. Others of the defendants demurred to the whole bill. All the demurrers, both in whole and in part, were sustained by the trial court. We are of the opinion that they should have been overruled.

A trust has usually appeared in the form of an agreement between stockholders in many corporations to place all their stock in the hands of trustees, and to receive trust certificates therefor from the trustees. But the question in the present case is whether a trust is created where a majority of stockholders consolidate their interests by conveying all their property to a corporation organized for the purpose of taking their property. Any combination of competing corporations for the purpose of controlling prices, or limiting production, or suppressing competition, is contrary to public policy, and is void. 2 Cook, Corp. 4th ed. § 503a. It makes no difference whether the combination is effected through the instrumentality of trustees and trust certificates, or whether it is effected by creating a new corporation, and conveying to it all the property of the competing corporations. The test is whether the necessary consequence of the combination is the controlling of prices, or limiting of production, or suppressing of competition, in such a way as thereby to create a monopoly. The demurrers confess the truth of the allegations in the bill; and those allegations are that a trust was created, or proposed to be created, by the organization of a new corporation, and the conveyance thereto of all the property owned by the six competing corporations, and the execution of agreements by the corporations, thus parting with their property, not any longer to engage in the manufacture of the industrial products in which they had been previously engaged. Six corporations were engaged in the manufacture of glucose, which can only be manufactured in a certain district or extent of country, and, with the exception of one small plant, were the only corporations engaged in such business. The allegations of the bill show that the ability to prosecute such business was rare, and that it is difficult for new parties, not familiar with it, to engage in it. Necessarily, when corporations thus situated unite together all their properties in one new organization, and permit the latter to operate their properties, competition will be suppressed, and the new corporation will possess the power to limit production and control prices. All of the competing corporations have been put out of the business by disposing of the plants with which they conducted their business. The grantee of said corporations has no competitor in the market.

The public policy of a state is to be found in its statutes, and, when they have not directly spoken, then in the decisions of the courts, and in the constant practice of government officials. When the legislature speaks upon a subject upon which it has the constitutional power to legislate, public policy is what the statute passed by it indicates. United States v. Trans-Missouri Freight Assn. 166 U. S. 290, 41 L. ed. 1007, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 540. The public policy of the state of Illinois has always been against trusts and combinations organized for the purpose of suppressing competition and creating monopoly.

In Craft v. McConoughy, 79 Ill. 346, 22 Am. Rep. 171, we held it to be a well-settled rule of law that an agreement in general restraint of trade is contrary to public policy, and is illegal and void.

In People ex rel. Peabody v. Chicago Gas Trust Co. 130 Ill. 268, 8 L. R. A. 497, 17 Am. St. Rep. 319, 22 N. E. 798, we forfeited the charter of a company on the ground that it was formed to bring about an illegal combination; and held that an agreement tending to prevent competition and create a monopoly is void by the principles of the common law, because it is against public policy, and that public policy favors competition in trade, and is opposed to monopoly, as tending to advance market prices to the injury of the general public.

A. 361, 33 Am. St. Rep. 216, 29 N. E. 888, we held, again, that contracts restraining the freedom of trade, diminishing competition, or regulating the prices of commodities are prohibited by law; and that all combinations of capitalists and of workmen in their especial favor, by raising or reducing the prices, are so far illegal; and that agreements to combine for such purposes will not be enforced by the courts.

Again in Bishop v. American Preservers' Co. 157 Ill. 284, 48 Am. St. Rep. 317, 41 N. E. 765, we held that an agreement providing for the welding together of all the interests engaged in a certain business in one giant combination, under the absolute dominion and control of a board of trustees, was void, as contrary to public policy.

It makes no difference that the agreement for the illegal combination is not a formal written agreement. It may be a verbal agreement or understanding, or a scheme not embodied in writing, but evidenced by the action of the parties. In the present case each of six corporations, engaged in the manufacture of glucose, made a contract to sell its plant to a new corporation to be organized, and agreed not to engage in such manufacture for a term of years, and then conveyed all its property to the new corporation organized to conduct the same kind of business; and it did all this with the knowledge and understanding that each of five other competing corporations was making the same kind of contract, and executing the same kind of conveyance, in respect to their own respective properties, all to be consummated and delivered at the same time, and under the direction and management of agents or promoters employed by all the corporations. If the transactions referred to in the bill in this case did not amount to an absolute agreement made in advance between the six corporations, they, at least, constituted a scheme understood by all the corporations, and participated in by them all. The carrying out of the scheme, thus understood and participated in, would necessarily result in the suppression of competition in the manufacture of glucose, and in the creation of a monopoly in that business. A part of the scheme was that none of the six corporations or their officers should, for years, engage in the manufacture of glucose, and this feature of the scheme necessarily contemplated a wiping out of all competition in the business.

In Distilling & Cattle Feeding Co. v. People, 156 Ill. 448, 47 Am. St. Rep. 200, 41 N. E. 188, we held that a combination to control the manufacture and sale of all distillery products, so as to stifle competition and regulate and dictate prices, was an illegal attempt to create a monopoly, and that as organization, which has a tendency to create a trust and constitute a monopoly, is contrary to public policy and unlawful. In the latter case it was claimed that the illegal character of the combination was removed by a change of organization, so as to have the properties of the combining distillery companies transferred directly to the new corporation organized for that purpose; but it was held that this change was formal, rather than substantial, and that the same interests were controlled by the same agencies as had controlled them under the former organization. So it is in the case at bar. The men who controlled the new corporation which was organized, to wit, the Glucose Sugar Refining Company, are the same men, for the most part, who were interested in and controlled some one or more of the six corporations which disposed of their plants. Many of the stockholders in the old corporations are holders of stock in the new corporation.

In Distilling & Cattle Feeding Co. v. People, 156 Ill. 448, 47 Am. St. Rep. 200, 41 N. E. 188, this court spoke with approval of the case of Richardson v. Buhl, 77 Mich. 632, 6 L. R. A. 457, 43 N. W. 1102; and in the Michigan case it appeared that the corporation known as the "Diamond Match Company" was organized to manufacture, buy, sell, and deal in friction matches, etc., and that the real object of the corporation was to buy up the property of all the corporations, or of individuals, engaged in the manufacture of friction matches, exacting from the seller in the several cases a bond that he would not for a term of years engage in, or aid anyone else in, the manufacture of matches, in any place where his action might conflict with the interests, or diminish the profits, of the Diamond Match Company; and in that case the purposes of the company were declared to be unlawful, and it was held that any contract made to further them was void, as against public policy. In Distilling & Cattle Feeding Co. v. People, 156 Ill. 448, 47 Am. St. Rep. 200, 41 N. E. 188, we used, in reference to this Michigan case, the following language (p. 489, 156 Ill., p. 217, 47 Am. St. Rep., and p. 201, 41 N. E.): "It was held that a corporation organized for the purpose of controlling the manufacture and sale of friction matches, and by means of which all competition was stifled, and opposition crushed, and the whole business of the country in that line engrossed by the corporation, was a menace to the public, its object and direct tendency being to prevent fair competition and to control prices; that it is no answer to say that the monopoly had in fact reduced the prices of friction matches; that such policy may have been necessary to crush competition; that the fact exists that it rests in the discretion of the corporation to raise prices at any time to an exorbitant degree; and that such combinations have frequently been condemned by courts as unlawful and against public policy."

The material consideration in the case of such combinations is, as a general thing, not that prices are raised, but that it rests in the power and discretion of the trust or corporation taking all the plants of the several corporations to raise prices at any time, if it sees fit to do so. It does not relieve the trust of its objectionable features that it may reduce the price of the articles which it manufactures, because such reduction may be brought about for the express purpose of crushing out some competitor or competitors. In the case at bar, however, the proof shows that, upon the completion of the new organization, and as soon as it began to operate the several plants conveyed to it, the price of glucose and its various products began to go up. One of the witnesses testifies that in May, 1897, the price of glucose was about 75 cents per 100 pounds, and that after that it began to go up, and went as high as $1.65 per 100 pounds.

The public policy of this state in regard to this matter is not only manifested by the decisions of the supreme court of the state, as already referred to, but by the legislation of this state. By an act approved June 11, 1891, the legislature of Illinois enacted that, "if any corporation organized under the laws of this or any other state . . . for transacting or conducting any kind of business in this state, or any . . . individual or other association of persons whosoever, shall create, enter into, become . . . a party to, any pool, trust, agreement, combination, confederation, or understanding with any other corporation, . . . individual, or any other person, or association of persons, to regulate or fix the price of any article of merchandise, or commodity, or shall enter into, become a member of or a party to, any pool, agreement, contract, combination, or confederation to fix or limit the amount or quantity of any article, commodity, or merchandise to be manufactured, mined, produced, or sold in this state, such corporation . . . or individual or other association of persons shall be deemed and adjudged guilty of a conspiracy to defraud, and be subject to indictment and punishment as provided in this act." Section 2 of the act provides that "it shall not be lawful for any corporation, . . . agent, officer, or employee, or the directors or stockholders of any corporation, to enter into any combination, contract, or agreement with any person or persons, corporation, or corporations, or with any stockholder or director thereof, the purpose and effect of which combination, contract, or agreement shall be to place the management or control of such combination or combinations, or the manufactured product thereof, in the hands of any trustee, or trustees, with the intent to limit or fix the price or lessen the production and sale of any article of commerce, use, or consumption, or to prevent, restrict, or diminish the manufacture or output of any such article." Section 3 provides that if a corporation, or a company, firm, or association, shall be found guilty of a violation of the act, it shall be punished by a fine running from $500 to $15,000, according to the number of times the offense is committed. Section 4 of the act provides that any president, manager, director, or other officer or agent, or receiver, of any corporation or association, or any member of any company or association, or any individual, found guilty of a violation of the 1st section of the act, may be punished by a fine of not less than $200, nor to exceed $1,000, or be punished by confinement in the county jail not to exceed one year, or both, in the discretion of the court, etc. Section 5 of the act provides that any contract or agreement in violation of any provision of the first four sections of the act shall be absolutely void. This act of June 11, 1891, came under the consideration of this court in Ford v. Chicago Milk Shippers' Asso. 155 Ill. 166, 27 L. R. A. 298, 39 N. E. 651, and was there held to be constitutional. Ill. Sess. Laws, p. 206.

If the allegations of the bill in this case are true, the parties engaged in the formation of the trust and combination heretofore described are guilty of the offense specified in the act of June 11, 1891. The demurrers admit the allegations of the bill to be true. The American Glucose Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the state of New Jersey, for transacting business in Illinois, and the other persons whose names appear in the record, created and entered into a trust or combination with themselves, and with one or more of the five corporations other than the American Glucose Company, who conveyed their plants to the Glucose Sugar Refining Company, and with the Glucose Sugar Refining Company, to regulate and fix the price of glucose and grape sugar and their products and by-products; and they also entered into such combination to fix or limit the amount or quantity of glucose to be manufactured, produced, or sold in this state. These parties, therefore, under the act, were guilty of a conspiracy to defraud. The testimony tends to sustain the allegations of the bill. James A. Lamon says: "The price of glucose has been within thirty or sixty days past $1 [per 100 pounds]. . . . The price is made, as I understand it, by Pope and by the combination. As I understand it at the present time, the glucose is $1.35, I believe, and twenty-five or a quarter of a cent a hundred rebate made at the expiration of six months to the purchaser. That is by this trust or combination." L. G. Yoe testifies: "Our last purchase was made of the Glucose Sugar Refining Company on the first of this month [October or November]. The price was $1.25. We were to have a rebate at the end of six months on condition of dealing exclusively with them." The evidence shows that efforts were made to induce Pope to go into the combination and transfer his plant or manufactory to the Glucose Sugar Refining Company. When Pope was on the stand as a witness in this case, and declined, under instructions from Wilson, to state whether or not he was manufacturing glucose at all at that time, or whether he had ever sold glucose, or whether he had manufactured much glucose during the preceding two years, he stated that he had had negotiations with Wilson, and with parties claiming to represent a combination or union of factories, but declined to state what price Wilson offered him for his factory.

By the act approved June 20, 1893, in regard to trusts and combines, the legislature of Illinois enacted "that a trust is a combination of capital, skill, or acts by two or more persons, firms, corporations, or associations of persons, or of two or more of them for either, any, or all of the following purposes: First, to create or carry out restrictions in trade. Second, to limit or reduce the production, or increase or reduce the price of merchandise or commodities. Third, to prevent competition in the manufacture, making, transportation, sale, or purchase of merchandise, produce, or commodities. Fourth, to fix at any standard or figure, whereby its price to the public shall be in any manner controlled or established, upon any article or commodity of merchandise, produce, or manufacture intended for sale, use, or consumption in this state; or to establish any pretended agency whereby the sale of any such article or commodity shall be covered up, and made to appear to be for the original vendor, for a like purpose or purposes, and to enable such original vendor or manufacturer to control the wholesale or retail price of any such article or commodity after the title to such article or commodity shall have passed from such vendor or manufacturer. Fifth, to make or enter into, or examine or carry out, any contract, obligation, or agreement of any kind or description by which they shall bind, or have bound, themselves not to sell, dispose of, or transport any article or commodity, or article of trade, use, merchandise, commerce, or consumption below a common standard figure or card or list price, or by which they shall agree in any manner to keep the price of such article, commodity, or transportation at a fixed or graduated figure, or by which they shall in any manner establish or settle the price of any article, or commodity, or transportation between them or themselves and others to preclude a free and unrestricted competition among themselves or others in the sale or transportation of any such article or commodity, or by which they shall agree to pool, combine, or unite any interests they may have in connection with the sale or transportation of any such article or commodity that its price might in any manner be affected." Section 2 of the act of 1893 provides that any corporation holding a charter under the laws of this state, which shall forfeit its charter and franchise. Section 4 provides that any foreign corporation violating any provision of the act is thereby denied the right and prohibited from doing any business in this state. Section 5 provides that "any violation of either or all of the provisions of § 1 of this act shall be and is hereby declared to be a conspiracy against trade, and a misdemeanor; and any person, who may be, or may become, engaged in any such conspiracy or take part therein or aid or advise in its commission, or who shall as principal, manager, director, agent, servant, or employee, or in any other capacity, knowingly carry out any of the stipulations, purposes, prices, rates, orders thereunder, or in pursuance thereof, shall be punished by fine not less than $2,000.00 nor more than $5,000.00." Section 6 provides that, in any indictment for any offense under the act, it shall be sufficient to state the purposes and effects of combination, and that the accused was a member of, and acted in pursuance of, it, without giving its name or description, etc. Section 7 provides that, in prosecutions under the act, it shall be sufficient to prove that a trust or combination as defined therein exists, and that the defendant belonged to it, or acted for or in connection with it, without proving all the members belonging to it, or proving or producing any article of agreement or any written instrument on which it might have been based, or that it was evidenced by any written instrument at all. Section 8 provides that any contract or agreement in violation of the act shall be absolutely void, and not enforceable, either in law or in equity.

The bill in this case most certainly contains allegations in regard to the existence of a combination of capital, and acts by two or more persons and corporations, to prevent competition in the manufacture of glucose and grape sugar, and their products and by-products, and to create and carry out restrictions in trade; which allegations bring the transactions referred to in the bill within the scope and meaning of § 1 of the act of 1893. Therefore the demurrers were improperly sustained to the bill.

3. Counsel for the Glucose Sugar Refining Company claim, however, that the demurrer was properly sustained to the bill upon the ground that a stockholder has no right to file such a bill as this. The position of counsel is that a stockholder can only file a bill to prevent the corporation from disposing of its properties upon the ground that it will affect his pecuniary interests, and because of the necessity of protecting his property rights, and because of the necessity of protecting himself from pecuniary loss or injury; and that a stockholder in a vendor corporation has no right to enjoin a sale and transfer of a factory owned by such vendor upon the ground that the vendee corporation proposes to create a monopoly in the manufacture of glucose, and to use the property sold to that end, the vendor being charged to have knowledge thereof. It is said that a stockholder does not represent the public, and has no right to maintain a bill to protect the public interests, or to prevent a violation of the law against trusts and combines. This contention assumes that the creation of a trust and monopoly, as described in the bill, will work no injury to the stockholder filing the bill. In support of this contention, counsel rely mainly upon the cases of Cope v. District Fair Assn. 99 Ill. 489, 39 Am. Rep. 30, and Coguard v. National Linseed Oil Co. 171 Ill. 480, 49 N. E. 563.

In Cope v. District Fair Assn. 99 Ill. 489, 39 Am. Rep. 30, the bill was filed by a stockholder in an incorporated fair association to restrain the company and its officers from permitting, for a pecuniary reward, gamblers to congregate and ply their vocation upon the grounds of the company during its annual exhibitions; but it did not appear there, from the bill or otherwise, that the complainant therein or the company had thereby sustained any pecuniary injury or loss. Here, the demurrer admits the allegations of the bill to be true, and the bill alleges that the proposed action of the American Glucose Company and its directors in disposing of its property will destroy the value of the complainants' stock therein, and will destroy the property and business of the glucose company, and irreparably injure the complainants, and that their stock will be reduced in value to less than one twentieth of its cost. Moreover, the bill expressly refers to the acts of 1891 and 1893, above set forth; and the latter act provides for a forfeiture of the charter and franchise of any corporation violating the provisions of the act, and the dissolution of its corporate existence. It is idle to say that a stockholder in a corporation would suffer no injury from a forfeiture of its charter rights and from its dissolution. In such a case, the corporation being destroyed, his stock therein would be completely wiped out, and be made of no effect. The stockholder has a right to protest against such use of its property by the managing officers of a corporation as will lead to such forfeiture and dissolution. But the matter complained of in the Cope Case did not relate to any disposition of the corporate property, but related merely to a license, given by the association to outside parties, permitting them to gamble. The case is not on all fours with the present case in any particular.

As to the case of Coquard v. National Linseed Oil Co. 171 Ill. 480, 49 N. E. 563, the main object of the bill there was to enjoin the officers of a corporation from interfering with the right of a stockholder to examine its books, etc. It would also appear that, in that case, the prayer of the bill was that the corporation should be wound up, and its charter should be forfeited; and it was held that such forfeiture, for injury to the public and to its rights, could only be enforced by the state. In the case at bar the bill does not seek the forfeiture of the charter. Moreover, it was alleged there that the stockholder filing the bill had, for anything that had appeared to the contrary, participated in the illegal acts of which he complained, and for a number of years had full knowledge of the occurrences which he recited, and it was there said that his participation or laches of many years barred him from obtaining relief on his own account. In that case, the main ground upon which the decision of the court was based was that, in order to entitle himself to relief against the formation and operation of an illegal trust, the complaining stockholder must be free from participation in such illegality, and cannot take personal advantage thereof, when he has been guilty of acquiescence and long delay. The Coquard Case is not applicable here. The bill here alleges, and the proof shows, that the dissenting stockholder who filed the bill vainly sought information from the officers of the American Glucose Company as to what they proposed to do in the matter of organizing a trust and disposing of its property thereto. The bill and proofs show that the stockholder filing this bill attended the meeting of stockholders held at Buffalo, August 3, 1897, for the purpose of taking action in reference to relinquishing the manufacturing of glucose and grape sugar, and selling the plant and property of the company; and that he there protested against such action on the part of the company, and presented a motion that the stockholders should refuse to ratify the offer and proposed contract for the sale of its Peoria plant. So far from acquiescing in the illegal action of the corporation, the plaintiff in error Harding did all that he could to defeat and prevent such action, and did this at once and without delay.

It must be remembered that here the pecuniary interest of the complaining stockholder was to be, and was, affected by the sale of the entire property of the American Glucose Company against his consent, and by the abandonment of its charter business against his consent, and by the utter inability of the corporation to make money or win profits, which necessarily resulted from such a sale, and from a contract not to further engage in the charter business, notwithstanding the American Glucose Company was a solvent and going concern, and doing, and able to continue to do, a profitable business. The shares of stock owned by a stockholder derive their value from the corporate property and franchise, although the stockholder's legal property in his stock is distinct from the property of the corporation. Porter v. Rockford, R. I. & St. L. R. Co. 76 Ill. 561. If the shares derive their value from the corporate property and franchise, they will have no value, practically, when all such corporate property is disposed of, and the right to carry on business is destroyed. What was here attempted was an abandonment of the business, and a sale of the assets, without a legal termination or dissolution of the company. It makes no difference that the stockholder is to be allowed to receive his proportionate share of the proceeds of the sale of the property. He has the right to hold his investment in the form of stock, and a change of such investment against his consent is a change which affects his pecuniary or financial interests. He has the right to be the judge whether such a change in his pecuniary status shall be made, or whether he shall continue his investment in the form of stock.

The bill in this case recites that the complainants therein filed it, not only in their own behalf, but in behalf of all other stockholders who might see fit to come into the suit and join therein. Where the officers of a corporation wrongfully deal with its property to the injury of the stockholders, the latter may maintain a bill against the company and its officers for relief against such misappropriation. Originally, the rule was that such a suit should be brought by the corporation itself; but equity permits a stockholder, either individually or on behalf of other stockholders similarly situated, to bring such a suit, where the corporation itself either refuses to do so, or where the facts show that the wrongdoing defendants constitute a majority of the managing body, or where it is reasonably certain that a demand made upon the proper officers of the corporation to bring the action would be unavailing. Green v. Hedenberg, 159 Ill. 489, 50 Am. St. Rep. 178, 42 N. E. 851; Bruschke v. Der Nord Chicago Schuetzen Verein, 145 Ill. 433, 34 N. E. 417. Here the bill alleges, and the proof shows, that the officers and directors of the American Glucose Company and the majority of its stockholders were in favor of disposing of its property to the new corporation to be formed, and that they adopted a resolution to carry out such action against the protest of Harding. Therefore no previous demand upon the managing officers to bring this suit would have been availing. It follows, however, that, where the bill in such case is filed by the stockholder, the final relief, when obtained, belongs to the corporation and all its stockholders, and not alone to the stockholder complaining. In view of this fact, Pomeroy, in his work on Equity Jurisprudence (§ 1095), says: "This view completely answers the objections which are sometimes raised in suits of this class, that the plaintiff has no interest in the subject-matter of the controversy nor in the relief. In fact, the plaintiff has no such direct interest. The defendant corporation alone has any direct interest. The plaintiff is permitted, notwithstanding his want of interest, to maintain the action solely to prevent an otherwise complete failure of justice." Morawetz, in his work on Private Corporations (§ 271), says: "A corporation and its shareholders are identical. . . . Obviously, then, any injury to a corporation must be an injury to its shareholders; and it follows that, subject to the limitations which have been pointed out, a shareholder is entitled to relief in equity on account of any wrong constituting an infringement of the corporate rights."

The views above expressed are abundantly sustained by authority. In Stewart v. Erie & W. Transp. Co. 17 Minn. 372, Gil. 348, the supreme court of Minnesota said: "We agree with the plaintiff's counsel, and with the cases by him cited, that it is against the general policy of the law to destroy or interfere with free competition. . . . An unauthorized monopoly is therefore against public policy, as destroying and interfering with free competition. . . . If a corporation is employing its statutory powers, funds, etc., for purposes not within the scope of its institution, a court of equity will, upon the application of a single dissentient stockholder, interfere by injunction. . . . The right of a stockholder to this interference seems to be placed upon the ground that, from the fact that the corporation was created for certain purposes, there is an implied contract that it shall not divert its powers or funds to other purposes, and that such diversion would be a species of breach of trust, . . . as well as a violation of law, which might endanger the existence of its charter. . . . But it is to a dissentient stockholder that the relief is granted, and to a stockholder who comes with diligence to assert his rights. . . . There is no good reason, of which we can conceive, why the plaintiff's right to maintain this action should stand upon any different footing because the contract provides for a monopoly than because it is simply ultra vires. In either case, the contract is illegal. . . . Defendant's objection that the complaint does not state a cause of action in plaintiff because no facts are alleged going to show that he will suffer any pecuniary damage in consequence of the contract complained of, is not well taken, not only because the complaint alleges that the effect of the contract, if carried out, will be to render plaintiff's stock worthless, but because, if the contract is illegal, as alleged, it may lead to a total forfeiture of the charter of the company in which plaintiff is a stockholder."

In Small v. Minneapolis Electro-Matrix Co. 45 Minn. 284, 47 N. W. 797, the court said: "We need not inquire how far, or under what circumstances, considerations of public policy and of the general interests of the state may affect the right of a corporation to discontinue the business for which it was created, and to surrender to another corporation its property and the conduct of such business. We do decide that such a surrender of the property, and, so far as possible, of the functions, of a corporation, in order that, while it is still continue in existence, its business may be carried on by another corporation, to which such transfer is made, would violate the rights of a nonassenting stockholder, arising from the contract implied, if not expressed, in the creation of such an organization, and he would be entitled to have such acts restrained by injunction." See also Abbot v. American Hard Rubber Co. 33 Barb. 578; People v. Ballard, 134 N. Y. 269, 17 L. R. A. 737, 32 N. E. 54.

In the fourth edition of Cook on Corporations (§§ 669, 670), it is said: "That a charter constitutes a contract between the corporation and its stockholders is a principle of law that has become firmly imbedded in the jurisprudence of modern times. . . . Any act or proposed act of the corporation, or of the directors, or of a majority of the stockholders, which is not within the expressed or implied powers of the charter of incorporation or of association—in other words, any ultra vires act—is a breach of the contract between the corporation and each one of its stockholders, and that consequently any one or more of the stockholders may object thereto, and compel the corporation to observe the terms of the contract as set forth in the charter.

. . . Ever since the case of Abbot v. American Hard Rubber Co. 33 Barb. 578, the law has been clearly established in this country that a dissenting stockholder may prevent the sale of all the corporate property by the directors, or by a majority of the stockholders, where the corporation is a solvent, going concern. And, even where a dissolution is the purpose in view, yet, if the corporation is a prosperous one, such a sale cannot be made. . . . If the purpose of such dissolution is not the bona fide discontinuance of the business, but is the continuance of that business by another new corporation, then the rule is that a dissenting stockholder may prevent the sale, even though it is made with a view to dissolution of the corporation. . . . Such a dissolution is practically a fraud on dissenting stockholders. It seeks to do indirectly what cannot legally be done directly."

The allegations of the bill in this case, as well as the answer of the Glucose Sugar Refining Company, and the testimony taken in the case, show that the property of the American Glucose Company was passed over to a new corporation, to wit, the Glucose Sugar Refining Company, and that the latter company was to continue the business theretofore prosecuted by the American Glucose Company, which was a solvent concern and doing a profitable business. There is no reason why the American Glucose Company should not have continued to prosecute its own business, instead of turning it over to be prosecuted by a new corporation, unless the officers, directors, and stockholders making the transfer to the new corporation expected, by suppressing competition, to fix and control prices, and thereby increase their own profits to the injury of the consumers of the manufactured products and of the public generally. It must be remembered that these transfers of properties were not made by the six corporations to a corporation already existing and doing business, but a new corporation was to be created, and was created, for the express purpose of taking and using the properties to be conveyed to it. All the arrangements for the several transfers were made before the new corporation was allowed to come into existence. The only purpose of its existence was to take and use, in a consolidated form, all the plants of the six old corporations. The illegal trust or combination was formed, not after the making of the sales, but by the sales themselves.

The contention of counsel for the Glucose Sugar Refining Company that the American Glucose Company had a right to make a sale of its plant to the new corporation, and that this transaction must be regarded by the court merely as a valid sale, is not supported by the allegations of the pleadings, or by the proofs herein. The transfer of its property, made by the American Glucose Company, was a transfer to a corporation created for the express purpose of taking its property and the property of other corporations, so as to use them in the suppression of competition, and in the creation of a monopoly in the manufacture of glucose and grape sugar, and their products and by-products. The whole scheme, as devised and consummated, was a fraud, not only on the public, but upon the dissenting stockholder filing this bill. We are therefore of the opinion that the bill was not demurrable because brought by a stockholder, and that the court below erred in sustaining the demurrer, if it was sustained upon that ground alone.

4. It is claimed by counsel that, inasmuch as the American Glucose Company is a corporation organized under the laws of the state of New Jersey, this bill will not lie. Counsel for defendants below introduced in evidence sections from 6 to 32 of an act of the legislature of New Jersey concerning corporations, passed in 1896, after the American Glucose Company was incorporated, which was in 1883. Section 27 of the act in question provides that every corporation organized under that act may change the nature of its business, increase and decrease its capital stock, etc., in the manner provided for in that section. Section 28 of the act provides that any corporation, whether organized under a special act of incorporation or under general laws, with certain exceptions, may relinquish one or more branches of its business. It is claimed that, under said §§ 27 and 28, the American Glucose Company was authorized, under the laws of the state which gave it its charter, to do the acts which have been heretofore referred to and set forth; and that, by reason of its being a foreign corporation, this state cannot entertain a bill which seeks to inquire into the manner in which its directors manage its affairs and exercise its charter powers. The bill alleges, and the proof shows, that the American Glucose Company owned a plant, consisting of real estate and buildings thereon, together with the machinery, fixtures, etc., therein, situated in the city of Peoria, in this state, and that it operated said plant in this state, and therewith conducted the business of manufacturing glucose and grape sugar. Being a foreign corporation, thus owning property and doing business in this state, it is subject to the same regulations and restrictions which apply to corporations organized under a charter granted by the state of Illinois. Section 26 of the Illinois act in regard to corporations provides that "foreign corporations and the officers and agents thereof, doing business in this state, shall be subjected to all the liabilities, restrictions, and duties that are or may be imposed upon corporations of like character, organized under the general laws of this state, and shall have no other or greater powers. And no foreign or domestic corporation, established or maintained in any way for the pecuniary profit of its stockholders or members, shall purchase or hold real estate in this state, except as provided for in this act." Section 5 of the Illinois act in regard to corporations provides that corporations formed thereunder "may own, possess, and enjoy so much real and personal estate as shall be necessary for the transaction of their business, and may sell and dispose of the same when not required for the uses of the corporation." As foreign corporations, and their officers and agents, doing business in this state, are subject to the liabilities and restrictions of domestic corporations of like character, and as domestic corporations are allowed to sell and dispose of the real and personal property used by them for the transaction of their business, when not required for the uses of the corporation, it follows that foreign corporations may sell and dispose of the real and personal estate necessary for the transaction of their business, when the same is not required for the uses of the corporation. There is no allegation in the pleadings in this case, and no testimony tending to prove, that the property of the American Glucose Company at Peoria was not required for the uses of that company. On the contrary, the proof tends to show that the property was required by the company for the business there conducted. As has already been stated, the company was in a solvent condition, and was doing a prosperous business. The disposition made of its property to a gigantic trust, with a capital stock of $40,000,000, was such a disposition as was not authorized by the statute. The act of 1891, which has already been set forth, applies to foreign corporations; as well as to domestic corporations; and the act of 1893, above set forth, by providing in § 4 that every foreign corporation, violating any provision of that act, shall be denied the right to do business within this state, impliedly requires the obedience of all foreign corporations doing business in this state to the provisions of that act.

It is the settled doctrine of this state, established by many decisions of this court, that foreign corporations do not come into this state as a matter of legal right, but only by comity, and that said corporations are subject to the same restrictions and duties as corporations formed in this state, and have no other or greater powers. Hazelton Boiler Co. v. Hazelton Tripod Boiler Co. 142 Ill. 494, 30 N. E. 339; Pennsylvania Co. for Ins. on Lives & G. A. v. Baurie, 143 Ill. 459, 33 N. E. 166; Bishop v. American Preservers' Co. 157 Ill. 284, 41 N. E. 765; Farmers' Loan & T. Co. v. Lake Street Elev. R. Co. 173 Ill. 439, 51 N. E. 55; Freis v. No. 4 Fidelity Bldg. & Sav. Union, 166 Ill. 128, 57 Am. St. Rep. 123, 46 N. E. 784; Rhodes v. Missouri Sav. & L. Co. 173 Ill. 621, 42 L. R. A. 93, 50 N. E. 998.

In Distilling & Cattle Feeding Co. v. People, 156 Ill. 448, 47 Am. St. Rep. 200, 41 N. E. 188, where the defendant corporation was organized to monopolize the business of manufacturing and selling all distillery products, and the various plants and properties used in that business were transferred to the defendant corporation, we said (p. 491, 156 Ill., p. 220, 47 Am. St. Rep., and p. 202, 41 N. E.): "The defendant is authorized to own such property as is necessary for carrying on its distillery business, and no more. Its power to acquire and hold property is limited to that purpose, and it has no power, by its charter, to enter upon a scheme of getting into its hands and under its control all, or substantially all, the distillery plants and the distillery business of the country, for the purpose of controlling production and prices, of crushing out competition, and of establishing a virtual monopoly in that business. Such purposes are foreign to the powers granted by the charter. Acquisitions of property to such extent and for such purpose do not come within the authority to own the property necessary for the the purpose of carrying on a general distillery business." This language applies both to the American Glucose Company and to the Glucose Sugar Refining Company. Foreign corporations cannot be permitted to come into this state for the purpose of asserting rights in contravention of our laws. Hazelton Boiler Co. v. Tripod Boiler Co. 142 Ill. 494, 30 N. E. 339.

In Pope v. Hanke, 155 Ill. 617, 28 L. R. A. 568, 40 N. E. 839, it was held that comity between different states does not require a law of one state to be executed in another when it will be against the public policy of the latter state; that no state is bound to recognize or enforce contracts which are injurious to the welfare of its people, or which are in violation of its own laws; and that a contract made in one state will not be enforced in another, when to do so would contravene the criminal laws of the latter state, or would be against the express prohibition of its laws. This same doctrine was also announced in Rhodes v. Missouri Sav. & L. Co. 173 Ill. 621, 42 L. R. A. 93, 50 N. E. 998.

The proof shows that nearly all the parties organizing and engineering the illegal combination known as the Glucose Sugar Refining Company were citizens of Illinois, and that four of the corporations which transferred their property to the Glucose Sugar Refining Company were operating their plants in Illinois, at Peoria, Rockford, and Chicago. Citizens of Illinois cannot evade the laws of Illinois passed against trusts and combines, and defy the public policy of the state, by going into a foreign state, and chartering a corporation to do business in this state in violation of its laws. When these foreign corporations come into this state to do business, they must conform to the laws and public policy of this state. Moreover, the property transferred to Johnson, and through him to the Glucose Sugar Refining Company, consisted largely of real estate located in Illinois, and nothing is better settled than that the validity of all transactions relating to land depends upon the laws of the state where the land is situated. Wunderle v. Wunderle, 144 Ill. 40, 19 L. R. A. 84, 33 N. E. 195. If real estate in Illinois owned by domestic corporations cannot be used for the purpose of carrying out the business of an illegal trust or combination, real estate in Illinois owned by a foreign corporation cannot be used for such a purpose. We are therefore of the opinion that the fact that the American Glucose Company and the Glucose Sugar Refining Company were foreign corporations does not militate against the power of the courts in this state to grant relief under such a bill as is filed in this case.

5. One of the features of the transaction by which the property of the American Glucose Company was taken from it is the contract entered into on August 11, 1897, between that company and the Glucose Sugar Refining Company. This contract indicates clearly that the object of the whole scheme was to suppress competition in the manufacture of the products referred to, and to create a monopoly therein. By the terms of that agreement, the American Glucose Company agreed that it would not, at any time during the period of twenty-five years from that date, within a radius of 1,500 miles of Chicago, engage in the business of buying, manufacturing, or selling glucose, grape sugar, or any of the products produced by any glucose factory; and it was therein recited that the agreement so to refrain from engaging in such business for the period named was a part of the consideration paid by the Glucose Sugar Refining Company for the purchase of the property of the American Glucose Company. Contracts in total restraint of trade are void; but contracts in restraint of trade are valid, and will be enforced, where the restraint is reasonable, partial, and founded upon a good consideration. In other words, all contracts made in general restraint of trade are void. A contract to refrain from trade throughout an entire state has been held to be general and illegal, while limitation to a particular place is allowable. It has, however, been held that some callings would be treated as being under general restraint, if inhibited by contract throughout the state, while others would not. 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 882; 9 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 884-888. Where a contract in restraint of trade is general not to pursue one's trade at all, or not to pursue it in the entire realm or country, the contract is clearly against public policy, and as such is void. Beach, Trusts, p. 114, § 37. In Hursen v. Gavin, 162 Ill. 377, 44 N. E. 735, we said: "Undoubtedly, contracts in total restraint of trade are void. . . . A contract in restraint is thus total and general when by it a party binds himself not to carry on his trade or business at all, or not to pursue it within the limits of a particular country or state."

The evidence shows that the manufacture of glucose and grape sugar and their products is confined to a certain "corn belt," where corn is raised, and that this district is embraced within the territory specified in the contract of August 11, 1897; that is to say, within a radius of 1,500 miles of Chicago. As the evidence in this record tends to show that glucose can only be manufactured successfully within this radius, the agreement not to manufacture and sell it therein amounted, in effect, to an agreement in total or general restraint of trade. Hence the agreement was void, and stamps the transaction of which it was a part as illegal.

6. The question arises, What is the proper judgment to be rendered by this court in this case? As has already been stated, the Glucose Sugar Refining Company filed a demurrer to a part of the bill and an answer to a part. The demurrer was directed against such parts of the bill as alleged the sale of the property of the American Glucose Company to be a part of one general transaction, which involved the sales of the properties of five other corporations. The answer purports to be directed to those parts of the bill which specify other features of the transfer of the property of the American Glucose Company outside of the connection of such transfer with the other transfers in question. The main relief sought by the bill is the setting aside of the transfer of the property of the American Glucose Company. It matters not that such transfer is sought to be set aside on several grounds. The relief is the same, whatever ground may be relied upon. The answer sets up the fact that the American Glucose Company is a corporation organized under the laws of New Jersey, for the purpose of engaging in the business of manufacturing glucose, etc., and other products of corn, in Illinois. It then proceeds to set up the execution of the deeds of the American Glucose Company to Johnson, and of Johnson to the Glucose Sugar Refining Company, and it then alleges that the latter company paid cash for the premises at the date of the delivery of said deeds. The bill had alleged that the method of the pool or combination was to swallow up or merge therein the plants engaged in such business in the United States by issuing to the several corporations, theretofore operating that business, stock in the said pool or combine or in said trust or corporation; and that, where this method failed, its method was to buy such other organizations and plants for cash. The buying of some of the plants for cash, when it was necessary, was a part of the method of carrying out the pool or combination. The demurrer, being directed to such parts of the bill as had reference to the formation of the pool or combination, was necessarily directed to those parts which alleged the payment of cash as a method of carrying it out, as well as to those parts which alleged the taking of stock in the new corporation as the method of securing the properties to be purchased. Hence the answer was directed to the same part of the bill to which the demurrer was directed. Again, the answer sets up facts showing that the American Glucose Company relinquished its manufacturing business at Peoria, and transferred its property, through the deeds to Johnson, to a new corporation, organized in New Jersey to do the same business in Illinois which the American Glucose Company had theretofore done in Illinois. In other words, the answer sets up facts showing that the American Glucose Company discontinued the business for which it was created, and surrendered to another corporation its property and the conduct of such business, without alleging in any way that the American Glucose Company was insolvent, or that it was necessary for it so to transfer its business and property. The effect of such transfer was to lessen the number of corporations engaged in the business of manufacturing glucose, because the answer treats the Glucose Sugar Refining Company as an already existing corporation, engaged in the business when the transfer to it was made. If this was so, the American Glucose Company, without cause, suppressed competition in the business to the extent stated. This part of the answer, therefore, was directed to the allegations in regard to the formation of a trust set forth in the bill, and was therefore directed to the same part of the bill which was demurred to. Again, the bill was charged by the Glucose Sugar Refining Company to be demurrable upon the ground that it was filed by a stockholder; and the reason why it is urged that a stockholder cannot file a bill is that a stockholder cannot enjoin the sale of the property of a corporation upon the ground that the purchaser intends to violate the criminal law of the state. The answer, however, proceeds to reply to the bill as though it was properly in court, and the stockholder had a right to file it. In other words, the answer concedes what the demurrer denies. The defendant may not answer and demur also to the same part of the bill. If he demur to a part, and answer to the same part, both cannot stand. The demurrer, in such case, is overruled by the answer. Barbey's Appeal, 119 Pa. 413, 13 Atl. 451; 6 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 414. We are inclined to the opinion that the answer of the Glucose Sugar Refining Company overrules its demurrer in one or more of the respects above referred to.

But, whether this is so or not, the Glucose Sugar Refining Company was a purchaser of the property pendente lite. Counsel for the Glucose Sugar Refining Company claim that there was a sale of this property to it. It is doubtful, under the evidence, whether there was any sale at all. The deed by the American Glucose Company was made to Johnson; but he swears that it was never delivered to him, and that he never purchased the property. The deed by the American Glucose Company was not made to the Glucose Sugar Refining Company, but was made to Johnson, and the deed is alleged to have been made by him to the Glucose Sugar Refining Company. Johnson received no purchase money, and when he signed the deed was not aware of the character of the instrument he was signing. The deed made to him, and the deed made by him, were made after this bill was filed, and after summons was served upon the American Glucose Company. Lis pendens begins from the service of the summons or subpoena after the filing of the bill. Grant v. Bennett, 93 Ill. 513. "A purchaser from the defendant while the suit is pending acquires his interest subject to such decree as may be rendered on the hearing." Norris v. Ile, 152 Ill. 190, 43 Am. St. Rep. 233, 38 N. E. 762. In Norris v. Ile, supra, we said (p. 205, 152 Ill., p. 244, 43 Am. St. Rep., and p. 766, 38 N. E.): "Where there is a purchase pendente lite, not only is the purchaser bound by the decree that may be made against the person from whom he derives title, but 'the litigating parties are exempted from taking any notice of the title so acquired, and such purchaser need not be made a party to the suit.' He is not a necessary party because his vendor or grantor continues as the representative of his interests, and the plaintiff or complainant may ignore his purchase, and proceed to final decree against the original parties." Here the American Glucose Company, and the officers and directors thereof, and the majority of stockholders, withdrew their answers, and submitted to a default, and a decree confessing all the allegations of the bill was entered against them. That decree is binding upon the Glucose Sugar Refining Company as a purchaser pendente lite. As a decree pro confesso was entered against the American Glucose Company, finding such allegations of the bill to be true as justify the setting aside of the sale of its property, the Glucose Sugar Refining Company, which claims to derive title from the American Glucose Company, is bound by this decree against the latter company. The decree pro confesso is sustained by the testimony in the record. Wilson, counsel for the Glucose Sugar Refining Company, was present at the taking of all the testimony on the part of the complainants below, and cross-examined the witnesses. The interests of the American Glucose Company, and its officers and directors, were one with those of the Glucose Sugar Refining Company. According to the showing made by this record, as soon as the answers of the former were withdrawn, their counsel at once entered their appearance as solicitors of the latter.

It is true that counsel for the Glucose Sugar Refining Company refused to allow witnesses to testify upon many material and important matters. Many of these witnesses say that they declined to answer simply because Wilson objected to the questions. Two of the counsel in this case refused to answer questions when they were upon the stand as witnesses. As we understand the record, the refusal to answer was not placed upon the ground that the witnesses would thereby criminate themselves, as showing their violation of the laws of the state against trusts and combines. Their privilege in this regard was not claimed. Nor did the main counsel, when testifying, base the refusal to answer upon the ground that to do so would be to divulge privileged communications. These witnesses were forbidden to answer merely upon the alleged ground that the questions addressed to them called for immaterial testimony. This is no reason why a witness should refuse to answer, where in the question no self-crimination or privileged communication is involved. Therefore the constant objections and refusals to answer, which appear all through this record, amount to an actual obstruction of the administration of justice. The fact of such refusal is to be considered against the defendants the same as any other refusal to produce evidence which was within the power of the witness. Such refusal to answer is competent evidence against the witness. Andreus v. Frye, 104 Mass. 234; 29 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 846. But, notwithstanding the difficulties thrown in the way of eliciting evidence by these objections and refusals to answer, the record contains sufficient testimony to set aside the transfer made of the property of the American Glucose Company, as the same is above detailed.

Many points are made by counsel for Joseph Firmenich and George Firmenich in their arguments in support of their demurrer to the bill. But in view of the disposition of the case, so far as the Firmenichs are concerned, which is hereinafter made, it is unnecessary to notice these points. Allegations of the bill which concern the Firmenichs are few and meager. Counsel for plaintiffs in error consents in his brief that the bill may be dismissed as to the Firmenichs. So far as the Illinois Trust & Savings Bank is concerned, it claims to have no interest in the transaction, except as a repository and holder in escrow of the papers of all the parties concerned. Therefore we are inclined to think that whatever error the circuit court committed in sustaining the demurrers of the Firmenichs and of the bank is not sufficient to justify a reversal and remandment of the cause for the purpose of allowing them to answer the bill.

The decree of the court below dismissing the bill is reversed, and the cause is remanded to the Circuit Court of Peoria County, with instructions to dismiss the bill as to Joseph Firmenich and George Firmenich and the Illinois Trust & Savings Bank, and to enter a decree setting aside the deed of the American Glucose Company to Edwin L. Johnson, and the deed executed by Edwin L. Johnson to the Glucose Sugar Refining Company, and all the contracts, assignments, and other instruments accompanying the delivery of those deeds, so far as the American Glucose Company and its directors and officers and stockholders are concerned, and to grant such other and further relief as is consistent with the prayer of the bill and as is sustained by the evidence already in the record.

Rehearing denied December 19, 1899.

Writ of error dismissed by Supreme Court of United States October 14, 1902.

PEOPLE of the State of Illinois, Appt.,
v.

R. Hall McCORMICK et al.

(208 Ill. 437.)

1. The succession tax cannot be assessed at the death of the testator upon the corpus of the estate when property is devised in trust which shall continue for a period of twenty years, during which time annuities shall be paid to certain persons named, among whom the estate shall be distributed at the expiration of that period if they are alive at that time, and, if they are not alive, among persons whom they shall appoint and certain persons named by the testator, under a statute authorizing a tax against a person who "shall become beneficially entitled, in possession or expectation, to any property or income thereof," where the tax rate differs according to the relationship to the testator of the person who ultimately becomes entitled to the property.
2. A present succession tax cannot be assessed upon a remainder when it cannot be determined who will ultimately be entitled to it.
3. A present succession tax cannot be imposed upon each annuitant to the full extent of his proportionate share of the entire fund from which the annuity is to be paid, although by joint action of all annuitants the entire income may be divided between them, where the will limits the amount to be paid to each in the absence of such joint action, and no increase can be made without the consent of all.

APPPEAL by the State from a judgment of the Cook County Court fixing the tax on the succession to the estate of Leander J. McCormick, deceased. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. E. M. Ashcraft, with Mr. H. J. Hamlin, Attorney General, for appellant:

Under the will of Leander J. McCormick each legatee became beneficially entitled, in possession or expectation, to an estate or interest that could be valued and presently taxed.

On petition for rehearing.

The fifth and sixth clauses of testator's will attempt to vest the title of his property in the trustee therein named for a period of twenty years, and the first clause of the sixth section provides: "Upon the termination of such trust by lapse of time, as aforesaid, I give, devise, and bequeath all the rest, residue, and remainder of my estate, with the accumulation thereof, so held in trust, to my three children, R. Hall McCormick, Leander Hamilton McCormick, and Nettie L. Goodhart, share and share alike." A fair construction of this will would be to hold that the trustee took a chattel interest, and that the beneficiaries named took the remainder in fee, and that the other clauses of the will, attempting to provide for contingencies which may never arise, are void as being repugnant to the clause vesting the fee in the beneficiaries named.

Scott, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a proceeding in the county court of Cook county to fix the inheritance tax in the matter of the estate of Leander J. McCormick who died testate on February 20, 1900, leaving an estate, the market value of which was fixed in this proceeding in the county court, after making all proper deductions on account of indebtedness and expenses of administration, at $3,548,680.67. Leander J. McCormick left no widow, and his only heirs at law are his three children, Nettie L. Goodhart, R. Hall McCormick, and Leander H. McCormick. The will is quite lengthy, and provides for many contingencies that may arise in the twenty years next succeeding the death of the testator. A proper understanding of the questions involved requires that the substance of several of its paragraphs be stated at some length.

The third clause of the will gives to the daughter the sum of $75,000 to procure for herself a home, the title to be vested in her for life, and after her death in her issue then living, per stirpes. If she should not desire to own a residence, then the testator's trustee is directed to invest the fund and pay the income to her until she should desire a home, or until the expiration of twenty years after his decease. In case the home should not be purchased within the twenty years, then this fund is to become the property of the daughter provided she survive the twenty years, and, if the home is not procured and the daughter does not survive the twenty years, then the income for the remainder of the twenty years is to be paid to her surviving issue for the balance of the twenty years, when the principal of the fund is to be distributed to her surviving issue per stirpes. In case she dies without issue prior to the lapse of twenty years after the death of the testator, or leaving issue who die prior to the lapse of the said last-mentioned period of twenty years, then the proceeds arising from the sale of the residence, if one shall have been procured, or the principal of the fund if a residence shall not have been procured, is to be distributed, one fourth as the daughter may by her last will appoint, and the remaining three fourths to fall into the residue of McCormick's estate; and, if the daughter does not appoint any person to take the one fourth then it also falls into the residue of his estate.

The fifth clause devised to the son R. Hall McCormick, as trustee, and to his successors in trust, the residue of the estate of the testator, the same to be invested, managed, and controlled for a term of twenty years after the testator's death, and directs that from the net income of the estate an annuity of $20,000 shall be paid throughout said period of twenty years to each of the three children, with a provision that if all the children shall agree, in writing, thereto, a larger sum than $20,000 per annum shall be paid to each of them from the net income of his estate, provided such larger sum can be advanced without prejudice to the general interest of the estate. In case of the death of either of the children prior to the expiration of twenty years, then three fourths of the annuity shall be paid to the issue of such child in such manner as such child shall by will appoint, and the other one fourth of the annuity shall be paid to any person whom such child by last will may appoint, and, failing such appointment as to either portion, respectively, the same to pass to the issue of the deceased child per stirpes, any increase in the amount of the annuity made in the manner aforesaid to take the same course, in the event of the decease of either child, as is provided for the annuity of $20,000 fixed by the will.

By the sixth clause it is provided: "It is my intention that up to the date of the full expiration of the twenty years after my decease . . . that none of the beneficiaries hereinafter mentioned are to take any interest in any of said property [referring to the residue of the estate] except the annuity and bequests hereinbefore mentioned prior to the expiration of said twenty years." It is then provided that the trust shall terminate at the end of the twenty-year period and upon such termination the residue of the estate, with accumulations, is devised, share and share alike, to the three children. In case R. Hall McCormick is deceased at the termination of the twenty-year period, with issue who survive that period, his portion of the residue is to be distributed among such persons as he may by his last will appoint, and, if no such appointment is made, then it is to be distributed equally among his children then surviving and the issue of any deceased child, such issue taking the share that the parent would take if living. In case Leander H. McCormick shall die prior to the expiration of the 64 L. R. A.

twenty-year period, his portion of the residue, except the sum of $100,000, shall be paid to and vested in his children then surviving and the issue of any deceased child of his as he may by his last will appoint; and the said sum of $100,000 shall be paid to and vested in any person appointed by the last will of said Leander H. McCormick; and failing any such appointment as to either portion, respectively, of such share of Leander H. McCormick, that portion shall be paid to and vested in the child or children of Leander H. McCormick then surviving, share and share alike, and to the issue of any deceased child such issue taking the share that the parent would if living. The same disposition is made of the portion of the residue devised to Nettie L. Goodhart, in case she dies prior to the expiration of the twenty-year period, as is made of the portion devised to Leander H. McCormick in the event of his death prior to the expiration of that period.

The seventh clause provides for the contingency of each of the children dying prior to the expiration of the twenty-year period without issue, or leaving issue none of whom survive the twenty-year period. If R. Hall McCormick shall die under such circumstances, he is given a power of appointment by his will, whereby he may designate the person or persons who shall become entitled to and in whom shall vest in fee one fourth of his portion of the residue, the remaining three fourths of his portion of the residue to pass to the surviving children of the testator, and the issue of such as are deceased. If he does not exercise the power of appointment as to the one fourth, then that is to pass with the three fourths. The same provision is made in reference to Leander H. McCormick and Nettie L. Goodhart, except that each has the power of appointment as to $100,000, only, of his or her portion of the residue.

The county court treated the interest of Nettie L. Goodhart in the $75,000 fund as a life estate, ascertained the present worth of such life estate, and fixed the tax upon such present worth, and ascertained also the present worth of the interest of each of the three children in the annuity of $20,000 per annum, and fixed the tax on the sum so ascertained. That portion of the estate which is to pass into the possession of the three children of the testator at the expiration of the twenty-year period was appraised at $2,903,506.67. The court below did not fix any tax against this remainder, for the reason, as stated in the order of the court, that the amount of the tax thereon is not now ascertainable, because it is impossible to determine who may be the beneficiaries of this portion of the estate, and what if any, relation they may bear to the testator, or the amounts which they will take, respectively, at the termination of the trust provided for in the will; and the order recites that the determination of the amount of the tax on that portion of the estate is deferred until such time as the uncertainties are removed. It was shown by stipulation that the net annual income from the portion of the estate devised to the trustee is at least $100,000.

An appeal has been prosecuted to this court by the people of the state of Illinois, and upon the errors assigned it is contended: First, that a tax should have been fixed upon that portion of the estate which is to be distributed at the end of the twenty-year period, on the theory that each of the three children took such an interest therein as was presently ascertainable and taxable under the statute; second, that a tax should have been fixed on the full amount of the $75,000 fund bequeathed for the use of Nettie L. Goodhart, instead of upon the present value of a life estate for her therein; third, that a tax should have been assessed upon the present value of the full amount of the net income of the estate of Leander J. McCormick for the period of twenty years from his death, on the basis that one third thereof passed to each of his children.

It will be seen by an inspection of § 366 of chapter 120, Hurd's Rev. Stat. 1901, that the tax is to be imposed where the beneficial interest in property has passed to the person taxed, and such tax may be imposed against any person who "shall become beneficially entitled in possession or expectation to any property or income thereof." It has been said that the terms "beneficially entitled" and "beneficially interested," as used in statutes providing for a tax of this character, when considered with regard to the time when the beneficiary becomes so entitled or interested, are construed to refer to the time when the beneficiary has the title to the property or is entitled to the possession thereof, or when a contingent interest vests, or when a defeasible interest becomes indefeasible (2 Woerner, Am. Law of Administration, 2d ed. p. 601a); while a "beneficial interest," when considered as a designation of the character of an estate, is such an interest as a devisee takes solely for his own use or benefit, and not as the mere holder of the title for the use of another (Re Seaman, 147 N. Y. 69, 41 N. E. 401).

It will be observed from this section of the statute that where the property passes to certain persons related to the testator by consanguinity or affinity an exemption is permitted; that the exemption is greater and the rate of taxation lower in case of those most nearly akin while the exemption is less and the rate higher in case of those farther removed; that in case of the stranger who is a beneficiary the rate of taxation is graduated according to the amount of property received, up to the sum of $50,000; in all cases where the succession exceeds that amount and passes to a stranger, the rate is the same. It is therefore obvious that the amount of tax cannot be fixed until it is certainly known who the beneficiaries are, and what portion of the property each will take.

It is contended on the part of appellant that each of the three children of the testator takes a vested interest in the property that is to pass from the trustee at the termination of the twenty-year period, while the view of counsel for appellees is that the interests devised in that property, which are to vest in possession at the end of that period, are contingent remainders. We will not indulge in any nice distinctions for the purpose of determining whether or not the interest in this residuary estate, into the possession of which each of the children of the testator is to enter at the end of the twenty-year period, is, in the technical meaning of the term, a "vested estate." If it can be said to be vested, it is subject to a condition of defeasance, because, if either of the children of the testator dies prior to the expiration of the period, his or her title to this property will thereby be defeated. Nothing is left but a power of appointment, which may or may not be exercised, and it is therefore wholly uncertain at this time who will, when the twenty years shall have elapsed, possess the beneficial interest in this property, or in what proportion this property will be divided among the persons who succeed to the beneficial ownership thereof.

The condition contemplated by our statute as that which should authorize the imposition of the tax is one of practical and actual ownership,—the possession of a title to something that can be conveyed. If either of the children of the testator, in this case, should convey, by deed, his or her interest in the remainder, and die before the expiration of the twenty years, the purchaser would take nothing; and, under such circumstances, to impose a tax upon either of the children of the testator on account of the right to succeed to the interest in the residuary estate would be to tax the shadow, and not the substance. It would result in taxing appellees upon their right to succeed to property, when, so far as any beneficial ownership is concerned, there never was a right of succession. The right to succeed, under such circumstances, is, for all practical purposes, a myth. Taxation to the taxpayer is intensely real. It should not be levied upon that which is unreal. If the estates now under consideration are contingent, they cannot be taxed until they are vested. If they are now vested, they are subject to an estate for years and subject to defeasance, and cannot be taxed until they become indefeasible. If they be executory devises, they cannot be taxed until the persons who will some time be beneficially entitled thereto are ascertained. Who can tell now whether R. Hall McCormick will die prior to the expiration of the twenty years? If so, will his issue survive that period? If he does not survive that period, will he or will he not exercise the power of appointment? It is impossible now to tell who will succeed to this portion of the residue of this estate. The situation is equally uncertain so far as each of the other children of the testator is concerned.

The right to tax is based upon the right to succeed. The amount of the tax is fixed by the amount of the property which, as a result of the right to succeed, passes to the beneficiary. The tax is levied on the succession, and not on the property as such. The rate must be determined by the amount of the succession where the beneficiary is a stranger, and the exemption, if any, must be determined by the identity of the person who succeeds. When the basis of the tax, the rate, and the exemption, if any, cannot be fixed, the tax itself cannot be fixed. No other course is left open, in the practical administration of the statute, than to postpone the assessing and collecting of the tax upon such remote and contingent interests as are incapable of valuation, and as to which the rate and the exemptions cannot be determined. Billings v. People, 189 Ill. 472, 59 L. R. A. 807, 59 N. E. 798; Re Hoffman, 143 N. Y. 327, 38 N. E. 311; Re Roosevelt, 143 N. Y. 120, 25 L. R. A. 695, 38 N. E. 281; Re Stewart, 131 N. Y. 274, 14 L. R. A. 836, 30 N. E. 184; Re Curtis, 142 N. Y. 219, 36 N. E. 887; Re Seaman, 147 N. Y. 69, 41 N. E. 401; Re Dow, 167 N. Y. 233, 52 L. R. A. 433, 88 Am. St. Rep. 509, 60 N. E. 439; Re Sloane, 154 N. Y. 109, 47 N. E. 978. As is suggested by Mr. Justice Finch in the Hoffman Case, 143 N. Y. 327, 38 N. E. 311, "the state will get its tax when the legatees get their property."

An ordinary vested remainder, not subject to any condition or contingency, as where the property is given to A for life with remainder to B, is, under the statute, immediately taxable as the property of B upon the death of the testator, because there the estate is immediately vested in interest in the remainderman, his heirs and assigns. Nothing can defeat it. B's right is absolute; his deed will transfer the property; an execution against him and sale thereunder will convey it; his death cannot affect it; he is beneficially entitled to it "in expectation." This term "expectation," as used in our statute, has reference only to possession. The language is, "by reason whereof any person . . . shall become beneficially entitled, in possession or expectation, to any property or income thereof." The term "expectation" is used, not to denote an expectation of becoming vested both with the title and the possession where neither is now vested but to denote a condition where the title is vested and the possession is deferred. The term "in expectation" is used in contradistinction to "in possession." Both contemplate a title vested and indefeasible, but in one instance the right of enjoyment is immediate, "in possession;" in the other it is postponed, "in expectation." As used in this statute, these words last quoted refer to the future possession of an estate now vested, and which is subject to the immediate enjoyment of another. It is true that in the case of Ayers v. Chicago Title & T. Co. 187 Ill. 42, 58 N. E. 318, this court said that, whether or not the remainders under consideration there were vested or contingent was not material, for the reason that they were "expectancies," within the meaning of the statute, and presently taxable as such. That language was unnecessary to the decision of that case so far as it referred to contingent remainders, because, as appears from a discussion of the subject found on page 60, 187 Ill., page 325, 58 N. E., the remainders in that case were vested remainders.

A brief consideration of a very common contingent remainder will show the fallacy of the doctrine that such a remainder is taxable immediately upon the death of the testator. Suppose A devises $100,000 to his son B for life, with the remainder to his son C in case C survives B; if not, then to a stranger; and that the appraised value of the remainder exceeds $50,000. If the remainder goes to the son, $20,000 of it is exempt, and the rate of tax is $1 on every $100, while if the remainder passes to the stranger there is no exemption and the rate is $6 on the $100. It is apparent that in such an instance the tax should not be fixed until the remainder vests.

As we have heretofore said, however, the right to impose the tax presently depends, not upon the character of the estate devised, with reference to its being a contingent or vested remainder, but upon the question whether the person who is now, or will ultimately be, entitled to a beneficial interest in the remainder, can be now identified, and whether the proportion thereof to which he will succeed can be now determined. What we have said in reference to the residuary estate disposes of the question presented in regard to the $75,000 fund. It cannot now be known who will be entitled to succeed to this fund, under the will, at the end of the twenty-year period. The interest which the daughter takes therein will be defeated by her death, should it occur before the lapse of that time. It would not have been proper to have treated her as the absolute owner of this fund in fixing the tax.

So far as the tax on the income is concerned, it is apparent that the income of each of the children can be increased, provided all consent, in writing, to the increase, and such increase will not embarrass the administration of the fund, and the position of appellant is that, as the children have the power to increase this fund until the aggregate amount of the annuity will equal the net income from the estate, subject to the condition just suggested, each must be held to be the owner of one third of such net income. No authority is cited on this proposition. It has seemed to us, on reflection, that the theory of the counsel for the people is wrong in this respect, for the reason that the three devisees under consideration are not taxed jointly. If either one of them had the power to have his or her annuity increased to one third of the net income of the estate, then we think each should be taxed upon the basis that he or she is the owner of one third of the net income; but, before either is entitled to any portion of the income above the sum of $20,- 000 per annum, the written consent of the other two must be obtained, and one or both of the others may never consent, in which event each of the children would be taxed upon an increase which they do not receive. If such written document should at any time be executed, the sum added to the income of each would become taxable, and, as suggested by the written opinion of the learned jurist who determined this matter in the county court, it would be entirely proper at any time, upon the motion of those representing the people of the state of Illinois, to cite the trustee and the children to appear in that court for the purpose of ascertaining whether such an instrument has been executed and the income of each increased accordingly.

At the expiration of the twenty-year period it will be certainly known who is beneficially entitled to the residuary estate and the remainder in the $75,000 fund. All doubts now existing will then be resolved. The exemptions and the rate can then be fixed without uncertainty. Then the legatee will get his property and "the state will get its tax." The imposition of the tax is properly deferred until that time.

The order of the County Court will be affirmed.

BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS OF CLINTON COUNTY, Appt.,

v.

Robert DAVIS.

(.....Ind.....)

1. One seeking to recover a reward offered by a public statute need not allege that he rendered his services with the knowledge that the reward was offered, or with intention to earn the same.
2. The vote buyer cannot claim the reward offered by a statute providing that a person who furnishes information resulting in the conviction of a person for selling his vote shall be entitled to a reward.
3. That a paragraph of an answer alleging facts sufficient to constitute a defense to the action purports to be only a partial answer does not render it insufficient as to such part.

Monks, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought by appellee, under § 2 of the act of March 4, 1899 (Acts 1899, chap. 166, p. 381, being § 2330, Burns's Rev. Stat. 1901), to recover nine separate rewards for furnishing information which secured the conviction of nine persons for a violation of § 1 of said act; being § 2329, Burns's Rev. Stat. 1901. It is provided by § 1 of said act of 1899 (being § 2329, supra) that "anyone who sells, barter, or offers to sell or barter, his vote, or offers to refrain from voting for any candidate or candidates at any general, special, or primary elections or convention, . . . or who shall accept any money, property, or thing of value with the promise or pretense of voting for or refraining from voting for any candidate or candidates, shall, upon conviction therefor, be," etc. The 2d section (being § 2330, supra) provides that "any person or persons having knowledge or information of the violation of the provisions of this act, who shall procure or furnish, or cause to be procured or furnished, the testimony necessary to secure a conviction of the person or persons violating the same, shall be entitled to a reward of $100.00 payable out of the treasury of the county in which such conviction shall be had, and the right to such reward shall be a valid claim against such county." Appellant's demurrer for want of facts to each of the nine paragraphs of complaint was overruled. Appellant filed an answer in five paragraphs, the first of which was a general denial. The court sustained appellee's demurrer for want of facts to each paragraph of answer, except the first. A trial of said cause resulted in a verdict, and, over a motion for a new trial, a judgment, in favor of appellee. The court's rulings on the demurrers, and the action of the court in overruling appellant's motion for a new trial, are called in question by the assignment of errors.

It is claimed by appellee that the pleadings are not in the record, and that for this reason the judgment must be affirmed. The reasons urged by appellee to sustain this contention are the same as those set forth in Southern Indiana R. Co. v. Martin, 160 Ind. 280, 66 N. E. 886, and Perry, M.-B. Stone Co. v. Wilson, 160 Ind. 435, 67 N. E. 183; and, upon the authority of those cases, we hold that the pleadings are properly in the record.

The objection urged against each paragraph of the complaint is that it is not averred that appellee "rendered the services with a knowledge that the reward was offered, or with the intention to recover the same." Such allegations are unnecessary in this state at least, when the reward is offered in a public statute. Dawkins v. Sappington, 26 Ind. 199, 200; Monroe County v. Wood, 39 Ind. 345, 351; Everman v. Hyman, 26 Ind. App. 165, 167-169, 84 Am. St. Rep. 284, 28 N. E. 1022, and cases cited. See also Auditor v. Ballard, 9 Bush, 572, 15 Am. Rep. 728; Eagle v. Smith, 4 Houst. (Del.) 293.

It appears from the allegations of the second, third, fourth, and fifth paragraphs of answer that appellee procured each person named in the nine paragraphs of complaint to violate § 2329, Burns's Rev. Stat. 1901, to sell his vote; that he induced each of said persons to commit said crime; and in some of said paragraphs of answer it is alleged that he induced them to commit said crime with the intention of furnishing the testimony necessary to secure a conviction, and, when convicted, to recover from the county the reward provided by § 2330, Burns's Rev. Stat. 1901. Said paragraphs of answer proceed upon the theory that, while the law offers a reward to any person who shall procure and furnish, or cause to be procured or furnished, the testimony necessary to secure a conviction of the offender, it was not intended to reward the person who bought the vote, or who procured the same to be done, or in any way aided or abetted therein. Appellee insists that the vote buyer comes within the terms of the statute, and for that reason the demurrer 64 L. R. A.

for want of facts was properly sustained to said paragraphs of answer. Said § 2330, supra, provides that "any person or persons having knowledge or information of the violation of the provisions of this act, who shall procure or furnish, or cause to be procured or furnished, the testimony, . . . shall be entitled to a reward." As counsel for the parties do not challenge the validity of said section, we may, without considering that question, determine its proper interpretation. Lewis v. Albertson, 152 Ind. 693, 49 N. E. 34; Williams v. Citizens' Enterprise Co. 153 Ind. 496, 55 N. E. 425; Boyd v. Brazil Block Coal Co. 152 Ind. 543, 544, 49 N. E. 797. The language employed is broad enough to include, not only the vote buyer, as contended by appellee, but also the vote seller. Was this the legislative intent? The natural import of the words of a statute according to their common use, when applied to the subject-matter is to be considered as expressing the legislative intent, unless it is repugnant to the acknowledged principles of justice and sound public policy, in which case the words ought to be restrained or enlarged so as to comport with those principles, unless the intention of the legislature is clearly and manifestly expressed to the contrary. This is because it will not be presumed that the legislature will violate principles of public policy, but, if such intention is clearly expressed, and is not obnoxious to any provision of the Constitution, it must have the force of law. Opinion of the Justices, 7 Mass. 523-526; Hittinger v. Westford, 135 Mass. 258, 259; Dixon v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 68 Fed. 630, 634, 635; Mawcull v. Collins, 8 Ind. 38; Black, Constr. & Interpretation of Laws, pp. 107, 108.

The Constitution of Massachusetts provided that the elector of a senator must be an inhabitant of the senatorial district in which he votes, and the elector for representative must have resided one year in the town before he could there be a voter. It was held in Opinion of Justices, 7 Mass. 524-526, that, while the words "inhabitants" and "residents" may comprehend aliens, they must be restrained to such inhabitants or residents as are citizens. The justices said at page 526: "This construction given to the Constitution is analogous to that given to several statutes. Creditors may levy their execution on the lands of the debtors, and hold them in fee simple, unless redeemed. Although the words of the statute are general, yet they are not deemed to include alien creditors. If they were so deemed, then, under color of a judgment and execution, the rule of the common law prohibiting an alien from holding lands against the commonwealth would be defeated. So a general provision is made for dower of widows; yet it is not supposed that a woman who is an alien can claim and have assigned to her dower in the lands of her deceased husband." For this reason, it is held that a statute should not be so construed as to authorize or permit a man to be a judge in his own case, or to determine his right to an office of trust or profit, unless the act so declares in express words. Day v. Savadge, Hobart, 85; Queen v. Owens, 2 El. & Bl. 86, 91-93, 28 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 316, 5 Jur. N. S. 764, 7 Week. Rep. 566; Mersey Docks v. Gibbs, L. R. 1 H. L. 93, 110, 11 H. L. Cas. 686, 35 L. J. Exch. N. S. 225, 12 Jur. N. S. 571, 14 L. T. N. S. 677, 14 Week. Rep. 872; Com. v. M'Closkey, 2 Rawle, 369, 372-376; Black, Constr. & Interpretation of Laws, p. 107; 1 Bl. Com. *91; Broom, Legal Maxims, pp. 116, 121. It was said in 1 Bl. Com. *91: "Thus, if an act of Parliament gives a man power to try all causes that arise in his manor of Dale, yet, if a cause should arise in which he himself is party, the act is construed not to extend to that, because it is unreasonable that any man should determine his own quarrel. But if we could conceive it possible for the Parliament to enact that he should try as well his own causes as those of other persons, there is no court that has power to defeat the intent of the legislature when couched in such evident and express words as leave no doubt whether it was the intent of the legislature or no."

It has been held upon grounds of public policy, that public corporations, such as counties, townships, cities, towns, school corporations, and public officers, are not subject to garnishment under a law providing that "all persons and corporations are subject to garnishment." To make such corporations and officers subject to garnishment, the act must so provide in express words. Wallace v. Lawyer, 54 Ind. 501, 505-509, 23 Am. Rep. 661, and cases cited; Switzer v. Wellington, 40 Kan. 250, 10 Am. St. Rep. 196, and note, 19 Pac. 620; First Nat. Bank v. Ottawa, 43 Kan. 295, 23 Pac. 485; School Dist. No. 4 v. Gage, 39 Mich. 484, 33 Am. Rep. 421; McLellan v. Young, 54 Ga. 399, 21 Am. Rep. 276; Dotterer v. Bowe, 84 Ga. 769, 11 S. E. 896; Baltimore v. Root, 63 Am. Dec. 696, and note (8 Md. 95); Rood, Garnishment, §§ 18, 19, 25-27; 2 Shinn, Attachment & Garnishment, §§ 500, 505.

It is also held upon grounds of public policy, that a law which provides that "mechanics and all persons performing labor or furnishing materials for the construction or repair of any building . . . may have a lien separately or jointly upon the building which they may have constructed or repaired 64 L. R. A.

. . . and on the interest of the owner in the lot or land on which it stands," does not authorize such lien upon public property devoted to public use. Parke County v. O'Connor, 86 Ind. 531, 535-538, 44 Am. Rep. 338, and cases cited; Fatout v. School Comrs., 102 Ind. 223, 231, 232, 1 N. E. 389; Louise v. Howard County, 94 Ind. 553, and cases cited; Secrist v. Delaware County, 100 Ind. 59; 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 577. It was said by this court in Parke County v. O'Connor, 86 Ind. 536, 44 Am. Rep. 338: "It is true that the statute of this state provides, in terms, for the acquisition and enforcement of a mechanic's lien upon and against 'any building;' but, broad and comprehensive as are the provisions of the statute, it must be construed in such manner as will not contravene settled principles of public policy. . . . There is no provision to the effect that such a lien may be acquired or enforced upon or against public property held for public use, and, in the absence of such a provision, we must hold . . . that such a lien can neither be acquired nor enforced upon or against such property held for such use."

Courts, in construing offers of reward made for the apprehension of persons charged with crime, have uniformly held that a ministerial officer, who, in the performance of his duties as such, apprehends the criminal, is not entitled to the reward. And in cases where rewards have been offered for the return of stolen property, it has been held that a sheriff or other peace officer who secured the property and returned it to the owner is not entitled to the reward, even though the offer was general to all persons. This is upon the ground that it is against public policy to allow a public officer for the discharge of his duties any compensation except that fixed by law. Davies v. Burns, 5 Allen, 349, 353; Pool v. Boston, 5 Cush. 219, 220, 221; Warner v. Grace, 14 Minn. 487, Gil. 364; Day v. Putnam Ins. Co. 16 Minn. 408, Gil. 365; Hutch v. Mann, 15 Wend. 44; *Smith v. Souger, 26 Am. Rep. 1, and note, pp. 5-10, 56 Ind. 42.

It is a maxim of the law that no man shall be permitted to profit by, or take advantage of, his own wrong, or to found any claim upon his own iniquity. Broom, Legal Maxims, pp. 279-297. Under this maxim, it has been uniformly held that a person who is connected with an alleged theft, either as a participator in the felonious taking, or in the concealing of the stolen goods, cannot recover a reward offered for their return. Jenkins v. Kelren, 12 Gray, 330, 332, 74 Am. Dec. 596. It is also held that any person who aids or abets in the commission of a crime, or advises or procures it to be committed, cannot recover a reward offered for the apprehension of the person who committed the same. Hassan v. Doe, 38 Me. 45; Jenkins v. Kelren, 12 Gray, 330, 332, 74 Am. Dec. 596. Under this maxim, it is held that one who sets fire to his own building cannot recover the insurance thereon, and that a beneficiary in a life insurance policy, who murders the person insured, cannot recover on such policy. Schmidt v. Northern Life Assn. 112 Iowa, 41, 44, 51 L. R. A. 141, 84 Am. St. Rep. 323, 83 N. W. 800, and cases cited; 51 Cent. L. J. 465, and note, 469, 470; Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Armstrong, 117 U. S. 591, 29 L. ed. 997, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 877.

It is true that in this case there was no statute making the purchase of votes a crime, and that we have no crimes in this state except those provided by statute; but bribery at elections was a crime at common law, as to the bribe giver and the bribe taker. Rea v. Pitt, 3 Burr. 1335, 1338-1340; 1 Russell, Crimes, 6th ed. 444; Cushing, Law & Practice of Legislative Assemblies, p. 70, § 189; Baum v. State, 157 Ind. 282, 285, 286, 55 L. R. A. 250, 61 N. E. 672, and authorities cited. While the one who buys or advises, aids, or abets in, vote buying, or procures the same to be done, is not guilty of the crime of bribery, under § 2329, supra, such conduct is wrong and immoral. One who buys a vote commits a wrongful, immoral, and iniquitous act,—a public wrong, because it affects the whole community. Public policy forbids that the vote buyer or vote seller should profit by such wrongful act, or found any claim upon such iniquity, whether made a crime by statute or not. Broad, therefore, as are the terms of said § 2330, supra, it must be construed so as not to contravene the principles of public policy. As said, § 2330, supra, contains no express provision to the effect that the vote buyer and vote seller are entitled to the benefit thereof, it is clear, from what we have said, and the authorities cited, that neither can recover said reward, although he furnished the testimony which secured the conviction of the vote seller. State ex rel. Beedle v. Schoonover, 135 Ind. 526, 21 L. R. A. 767, 35 N. E. 119, is cited by appellee as supporting the construction of § 2330, supra,—that the vote buyer comes within its provisions. In that case the vote seller brought an action, under the act of 1889 (Acts 1889, chap. 200, pp. 360-363, §§ 6325-6339, Burns's Rev. Stat. 1894), to recover $300 and attorneys' fees from the person who bought his vote. That act, however, provided in express terms that the vote buyer, and those "aiding, abetting, counseling, encouraging, or advising such acts [vote buying, etc.], shall thereby become liable jointly and severally to the vote seller in the sum of $300, and reasonable attorneys' fees," in an action to be brought in the name of the state on the relation of the said vote seller. Said act was held constitutional, and the recovery by the vote seller thereunder against the vote buyer was sustained. Nothing that we have said or held in this case is in conflict with what was decided in State ex rel. Beedle v. Schoonover, 135 Ind. 526, 21 L. R. A. 767, 35 N. E. 119.

It is clear that the said paragraphs of answer were sufficient to withstand the demurrer for want of facts. As the fourth paragraph of answer alleges facts sufficient to constitute a defense to the action, the mere fact that it purports to be only a partial answer does not render it insufficient as to such part.

Judgment reversed, with instructions to overrule the demurrer to the second, third, fourth, and fifth paragraphs of answer.

ERROR to the District Court for Sedgewick County to review a judgment in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover money which had been deposited in the defendant bank and applied to the account of the other defendants, although it was alleged to belong to the plaintiff. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Adams & Adams, for plaintiff in error:

The factor or agent cannot acquire title to the funds of his principal by simply depositing them in the bank to his own credit. Before the bank can justify the withholding or retention of funds from the principal when so deposited, it must, by proper pleading, specifically set forth its defense, and must prove affirmatively the defense or justification for withholding or appropriating the trust funds. Having traced the money into the appellant's possession, it is presumed to be there still.

There is ample evidence in the record showing that the bank had knowledge of the character of the fund it received, and could have known, and should have known, by the exercise of ordinary diligence, that the check so appropriated by the bank was not the property of the commission company, but the property of another whose stock the commission company had sold.

Notice to the bank is sufficiently shown if it appears from the evidence that, by the exercise of ordinary diligence and prudence, it could have known or discovered the character of the fund.

If it were true that the money was received by the bank under circumstances to constitute it a trust fund, the bank would still be justified in applying it to the payment of a pre-existing debt, and would be protected in such application.

The burden rested upon the plaintiff to prove that the bank was not a bona fide purchaser for value of the check; and the presumption is that it purchased it for value in good faith, without notice of any rights or interest of third persons.

Mason, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On April 20, 1900, S. W. Kimmel, of Garber, Oklahoma, shipped to a Wichita commission firm known as the "Wichita Live Stock Commission Company" a car load of hogs, with directions to sell and send him the net proceeds by draft. The hogs were sold to Jacob Dold & Son on April 25th, and the commission company at once mailed to Kimmel its personal check upon the Kansas National Bank of Wichita, where it had had an account for several years, for $1,016.16, being the amount for which the sale was made, less the commission and expenses. Dold & Son paid for the hogs, April 26th, with a check made payable to the order of the commission company, drawn upon another Wichita bank. The company at once indorsed the check and deposited it in its bank, receiving credit upon its deposit account, and it was paid on the same day. Kimmel deposited the check sent him by the commission company with his local banker, and it was forwarded for collection through the ordinary banking channels, reaching Wichita May 1st, when it was presented to the bank on which it was drawn, which refused payment. Kimmel then sued the bank for the amount of the check, alleging that the deposit of the proceeds of the sale of the hogs was made without his authority and in violation of his instructions, and that the bank knew all the circumstances connected with the transaction. The bank answered, denying knowledge of the relations of plaintiff and the commission company, and alleging that when the Dold check was deposited the company's account was overdrawn by more than that amount, that the overdraft had been permitted upon an agreement that it should forthwith be made good by deposits, and that the check when deposited was applied to such overdraft, without notice of plaintiff's claim. Plaintiff replied with a general denial. Upon the trial the court sustained a demurrer to plaintiff's evidence, and rendered judgment accordingly, which plaintiff now seeks to reverse.

The evidence was mainly directed to the question of the bank's knowledge of the commission company's business. Substantially the same facts were shown in this regard as in Martin v. Kansas Nat. Bank, 66 Kan. 655, 72 Pac. 218, which grew out of a similar claim against the same bank made by another shipper. Here, as in that case, an effort was made to show such intimacy of dealing between the bank and the commission company as to justify charging the former with actual or constructive notice of plaintiff's interest in the check deposited by the latter. In fact, however, little more was shown than that the bank knew that the company was engaged in the commission business, and that its account was sometimes overdrawn. The evidence on this point, being stated in some detail in the Martin Case, will not be further reviewed. Following the conclusion reached in that case, we hold that the bank must be deemed not to have had notice of the relation of the commission company to the shipper. Plaintiff claims that the record does not show that the account of the commission company was overdrawn to the amount of the Dold check at the time it was deposited. The evidence in this regard is not as full as might be desired, but we think that upon the consideration of the entire testimony it sufficiently appears that such was the fact. Indeed, it is perhaps to be inferred that the overdraft was allowed to be created in virtue of a statement by the commission company that it had funds ready to deposit against it, having reference to this very check. The question incidentally suggested in Martin v. Kansas Nat. Bank, 66 Kan. 655, 72 Pac. 218, is therefore fairly presented: Can a bank be held to account to the owner of a fund which has been deposited by an agent in his own name and applied upon the agent's overdraft, the bank having no knowledge of the agency? The strongest case cited in support of the contention of plaintiff in error for an affirmative answer to this question is that of Cady v. South Omaha Nat. Bank, 46 Neb. 756, 65 N. W. 906, 49 Neb. 125, 68 N. W. 358. The third paragraph of the syllabus reads: "F., a commission merchant, deposited in bank money realized from the sale of live stock consigned to him by C., his account with the bank being at the time largely overdrawn. Held, regardless of the question of notice, that the bank is accountable to C., and that it cannot apply the money so deposited in satisfaction of F.'s indebtedness." Under the evidence in that case, as stated in the opinion, it might well have been said that the bank was chargeable with notice, but no account was taken of this fact as a basis for the conclusion reached. In the opinion a number of cases are cited, one of which, Davis v. Pan-handle Nat. Bank (Tex. Civ. App.) 29 S. W. 926, seems to be entirely in point, holding that, where an agent deposits the money of his principal in his own name, the bank cannot hold it for the debt of the agent, although it has no knowledge of the agency, unless it would otherwise lose its claim. No authorities are cited or arguments presented in support of this conclusion, the opinion merely stating that the court did not see upon what principle the bank should be allowed to retain the money, and that it was perfectly manifest that it had no right to do so. A brief review of the other cases cited will show that they do not go so far as the Nebraska decision. In Pennell v. Deffell, 4 De G. M. & G. 372, 23 L. J. Ch. N. S. 115, 18 Jur. 273, 1 Week. Rep. 499, 1 Eq. Rep. 579, it was held that trust funds deposited by a trustee in his own name, together with money of his own, could be followed by the beneficiary; but the controversy was between the beneficiary and the executors of the trustee, the bank making no claim. In Van Allen v. American Nat. Bank, 52 N. Y. 1, the bank likewise made no claim to the money in controversy, and it was held that it could be required to pay it to the real owner, although it was deposited in the name of another, who gave the real owner a check for it. The questions discussed were purely technical. In Burnett v. First Nat. Bank, 38 Mich. 630, an agent deposited funds of his principal in his own name. Some six months later he died, and the bank then attempted to apply the deposit to a debt of the decedent, the character of which is not shown in the reported decision. It was held that this could not be done, the case turning upon the fact that the agent never authorized the money to be applied to his debt. In Third Nat. Bank v. Stillwater Gas. Co. 36 Minn. 75, 30 N. W. 440, it was merely held that money obtained by a bank by fraud could be recovered by the real owner, although it had passed through several hands. In Peak v. Elliscott, 30 Kan. 156, 46 Am. Rep. 90, 1 Pac. 499, the money involved was not paid to the bank as a deposit, but for a specific purpose, and, as this was not performed, it was held that on the insolvency of the bank it should go to the owner 64 L. R. A.

and not to the general creditors. In Baker v. New York Nat. Exch. Bank, 100 N. Y. 31, 53 Am. Rep. 150, 2 N. E. 452, it was held that a bank, having notice of the trust character of a fund deposited by a firm in its own name, with the addition of the word "agents," could not apply it to the debt of the firm. In Whitley v. Foy, 59 N. C. 34, 78 Am. Dec. 236, the bank had actual notice that money deposited in the name of one person was owned by another; moreover, the controversy was between the real owners and the administrators of the depositor. In Central Nat. Bank v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. 104 U. S. 54, 26 L. ed. 693, and Union Stock Yards Nat. Bank v. Gillespie, 137 U. S. 411, 34 L. ed. 724, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 118, the facts were held to give the banks notice of the trust character of the deposits involved. First Nat. Bank v. Hummel, 14 Colo. 259, 8 L. R. A. 788, 20 Am. St. Rep. 257, 23 Pac. 986, cited on rehearing in Cady v. South Omaha Nat. Bank, 49 Neb. 125, 68 N. W. 358, was another controversy between the beneficial owner of a trust fund and the administrators of the trustee. In Hutchinson v. Manhattan Co. 9 Misc. 343, 29 N. Y. Supp. 1103, a check was deposited by an agent for collection only, and it was held that the bank could not hold it for the debt of the agent, because this was contrary to the intention of all the other parties in interest, including the agent. The decision, moreover, was reversed by the court of appeals. See 150 N. Y. 250, 44 N. E. 775. In Clemmer v. Drovers' Nat. Bank, 157 Ill. 206, 41 N. E. 728, the bank knew of the trust character of the deposit. These are all the cases cited on this branch of the case by the Nebraska court. The same doctrine is announced in 2 Morse, Banks & Banking, § 590, citing this case, that of Burnett v. First Nat. Bank, 38 Mich. 630, which has already been commented upon, and Cook v. Tullis, 18 Wall. 332, 21 L. ed. 933, which only declares the right of the real owner of property to hold it against the trustees in bankruptcy of one to whose care it had been confided.

Plaintiff in error also cites Farmers' & M. Bank v. Farwell, 7 C. C. A. 391, 19 U. S. App. 256, 58 Fed. 633. Expressions are found in the opinion in that case favorable to his contention, but the decision turned largely upon the fact that the money sought to be held by the bank did not reach it by any act of its debtor, or even with his knowledge, but was deposited in his name by his attorney through mistake.

A conclusion different from that of the Nebraska court is reached in Smith v. Des Moines Nat. Bank, 107 Iowa, 620, 78 N. W. 238, where the authorities bearing upon the matter are collected and reviewed. The scope of the opinion is indicated by a paragraph of the syllabus, reading as follows: "A cestui que trust cannot recover trust moneys which were deposited in a bank by the trustee in his own name, and which, without notice of their trust character, the bank applied to a matured individual note of the trustee, surrendering the note to the latter." We think this decision is in accordance with the weight of authority and with the better reason. The facts there presented differed in no material respect from those now under consideration, except that the depositor expressly agreed that the bank might apply the deposit to his debt, and the bank surrendered the note which evidenced it. Where a depositor carries an account with a bank as a part of his usual business, continually drawing checks and making deposits, sometimes having a balance to his credit and sometimes being overdrawn, it seems clear that the mere act of making a deposit is equivalent to an agreement that it shall apply against any overdraft that may exist at the time. Presumptively that would seem to be the very purpose of the deposit. "It has long been settled that a banker who has advanced money to another has a general lien, on all securities of the latter which are in his hands, for the amount of his general balance, unless such securities were delivered to him under a particular agreement limiting their application." Wood v. Boylston Nat. Bank, 129 Mass. 358, 37 Am. Rep. 366. "When a depositor opens an account in a bank, that very act, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, authorizes the appropriation of his deposit balance to any matured claims the bank may hold against him, the same as if he then executed an agreement in writing to that effect." Meyers v. New York County Nat. Bank, 36 App. Div. 482, 55 N. Y. Supp. 504, 506. But if the general rule were otherwise, the circumstances of this case, already stated, would amount to an authority to the bank from its customer to apply the deposit to the overdraft. And there seems no just ground for making a distinction, for any purpose here involved, between the payment of a past-due debt that is evidenced by a note and the payment of one that is a mere matter of book account. No such distinction is made where the question relates to the consideration for the transfer of negotiable paper. Draper v. Cowles, 27 Kan. 484; Mann v. Second Nat. Bank, 30 Kan. 422, 1 Pac. 579. Indeed, the very principle of protection to the innocent purchaser of commercial paper is invoked by defendant in error. The check deposited in this case was a negotiable instrument. The substantial controversy is as to its ownership. The bank acquired it from one who had the apparent title, without notice of any other claim. The argument that these considerations are sufficient to sustain the defendant's position seems sound. But the business was conducted as a cash transaction. The commission firm might have collected the Dold check themselves and deposited the cash in the bank, and the question presented would not have been materially different. The principle upon which transfers of negotiable instruments in payment of, and even as security for, existing debts are upheld, is the desirability of promoting their currency. Birket v. Elward (Kan.) 74 Pac. 1100. Surely no greater currency should be given to notes and bills than to actual money.

"The rule has been settled, by a long line of cases, that money obtained by fraud or felony cannot be followed by the true owner into the hands of one who has received it bona fide and for a valuable consideration in due course of business. . . . It is said that the case is to be governed by the doctrine, established in this state, that an antecedent debt is not such a consideration as will cut off the equities of third parties in respect of negotiable securities obtained by fraud. But no case has been referred to where this doctrine has been applied to money received in good faith in payment of a debt. It is absolutely necessary for practical business transactions that the payee of money in due course of business shall not be put upon inquiry at his peril as to the title of the payor. Money has no earmark. The purchaser of a chattel or a chose in action may, by inquiry, in most cases, ascertain the right of the person from whom he takes the title. But it is generally impracticable to trace the source from which the possessor of money has derived it. It would introduce great confusion into commercial dealings if the creditor who receives money in payment of a debt is subject to the risk of accounting therefor to a third person who may be able to show that the debtor obtained it from him by felony or fraud. The law wisely, from considerations of public policy and convenience, and to give security and certainty to business transactions, adjudges that the possession of money vests the title in the holder as to third persons dealing with him and receiving it in due course of business, and in good faith, upon a valid consideration. If the consideration is good as between the parties, it is good as to all the world." Stephens v. Board of Education, 79 N. Y. 183, 35 Am. Rep. 511.

"If a trustee or other fiduciary person, in violation of his own duty, uses trust money to pay an antecedent debt of his own to a creditor, who has no notice of the breach of trust, or that the money is subject to the trust, in such a manner that the money is received as a general payment, and not as a distinct and separate fund, then the money becomes free from the trust, and cannot be followed by the beneficiary into the hands of the creditor, although, in general, an antecedent debt does not constitute a valuable consideration." Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1048.

In addition to the authorities cited in Smith v. Des Moines Nat. Bank, see First Nat. Bank v. Valley State Bank, 60 Kan. 621, 57 Pac. 510; Goshen Nat. Bank v. State, 141 N. Y. 379, 36 N. E. 316; Holly v. Missionary Society, 180 U. S. 284, 45 L. ed. 531, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 395; and Meyers v. New York County Nat. Bank, 55 N. Y. Supp. 504, 506, 36 App. Div. 482. The syllabus in the last-named case reads: "A bank, having previous authority to apply a customer's deposit to his debt, can appropriate it to the debt, though the deposit was, in part, money of the depositor's ward, the bank having no knowledge of the fact."

We think that a bank which receives from an agent for deposit in his own name the money of his principal, without notice of the agency, is protected by applying it to a past-due debt of the depositor, to the same extent as in paying it out upon his check, whenever such application is authorized by the agent, either expressly or by legal implication, and that such authority ordinarily arises from the making of a deposit upon an overdrawn account, when no other directions are given.

The judgment is affirmed.

All the Justices concur.

v.

William J. KREHBIEL.

(.....Kan.....)

*1. Chapter 37b, Gen. Stat. 1901 (chap. 249, p. 439, Laws 1901), relating to libel, is unconstitutional and void, being in conflict with § 18 of the Bill of Rights, in this: That it denies the right in certain cases to one injured in his reputation to have remedy therefor by due course of law.

2. "Remedy by due course of law," as used in § 18 of the Bill of Rights, means the reparation for injury, ordered by a tribunal having jurisdiction, in due course of procedure, after a fair hearing.

*Headnotes by CUNNINGHAM, J.

NOTE.—For other cases in this series as to validity of statutes limiting recovery against newspaper proprietor for libel to actual damages where retraction is made, see Park v. Detroit Free Press Co. 1 L. R. A. 599, and Allen v. Pioneer Press Co. 3 L. R. A. 532, 64 L. R. A.

3. The right to a remedy by due course of law is not satisfied by the requirement contained in a statute to make specific reparation for the injury done, which reparation is the same in all cases, and bears no relation to the injury suffered, nor has been decreed by a tribunal after ascertainment of the extent of such injury.

4. While one part of a statute may be unconstitutional and void, and another part good, this is the case only where the portions are clearly separable and susceptible of separate enforcement; but when it is apparent that the entire faulty enactment is designed to constitute a complete whole, and that one part would not have been enacted except in connection with the other, if a part is found to be bad the entire statute must fall.

5. A false publication, charging that one had been arrested accused of an assault, and, in attempting to collect a bill, he threatened violence with a pistol, is libelous per se, and the libeled one may have general damages, without alleging or proving specific injury.

ERROR to the District Court for McPherson County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged publication of a libel. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John F. Hanson, in propria persona:

Park v. Detroit Free Press Co. 72 Mich. 560, 1 L. R. A. 599, 16 Am. St. Rep. 544, 40 N. W. 731; Derham v. Derham, 125 Mich. 109, 83 N. W. 1005; McGee v. Baumgartner, 121 Mich. 287, 80 N. W. 21.

The libel law is class legislation. It seems to be wholly arbitrary, unjust, and without good reasons. There are other publications that deserve protection more than newspapers, if it is proper to give it in any instances. Take, for instance, a commercial agency whose business it is to rate business firms. Such an agency, though exercising the greatest care and vigilance, and actuated by the best motives, is liable, even if it makes an honest mistake (Sunderlin v. Bradstreet 46 N. Y. 188, 7 Am. Rep. 322; Taylor v. Church, 8 N. Y. 452; Bradstreet Co. v. Gill, 72 Tex. 115, 2 L. R. A. 405, 13 Am. St. Rep. 768, 9 S. W. 753; Erber v. Dun, 4 McCrary, 160, 12 Fed. 526; King v. Patterson, 49 N. J. L. 417, 60 Am. Rep. 622, 9 Atl. 705; Johnson v. Bradstreet Co. 77 Ga. 172, 4 Am. St. Rep. 77); while a newspaper commenting on a firm's financial standing under similar circumstances, with the possible exception that it is less competent to do so and has less facilities for information, goes "Scott free."

If the law is constitutional, the petition need not allege notice in order to state a cause of action for the recovery of damages on account of want of good faith.

When there is injury there is malice.

Townshend, Slander & Libel, 2d ed p. 123, note 4.

To change the basic principle of libel so as to prevent a remedy for injury to reputation, which really exists, as it is presumed to and does in all instances of libel, is the same as to deny, point-blank, that remedy for injury to reputation.

Townshend, Slander & Libel, 2d ed. p. 185, note 3.

Mr. P. J. Galle, for defendant in error:

The statute provides a mode of procedure that must be followed before a petition can be filed. It does not deprive the party injured of a remedy by due course of law, but lays down certain rules of procedure that must be followed; and, if retraction is made, and the article was published in good faith, etc., only actual damages can be collected. Retraction of a libel was always admissible in mitigation of damages; so this statute only extends the rule of evidence so as to admit intention and good faith.

Allen v. Pioneer Press Co. 40 Minn. 117, 3 L. R. A. 534, 12 Am. St. Rep. 707, 41 N. W. 936; 18 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 1084; Hotchkiss v. Porter, 30 Conn. 414; Moore v. Stevenson, 27 Conn. 14.

The action of the lawmaking power must in all cases be upheld, unless its action is manifestly in contravention of the Constitution.

State v. Barrett, 27 Kan. 213; Cherokee County v. State, 36 Kan. 337, 13 Pac. 558; State ex rel. Johnson v. Hitchcock, 1 Kan. 178, 81 Am. Dec. 503; *Leavenworth County v. A law may be limited to a certain class of people if it operates generally alike on that class, and still not be unconstitutional.

The court will uphold the constitutional part of the law.

State v. Wait, 44 Kan. 314, 24 Pac. 354.

Cunningham, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff's action was for the recovery of damages occasioned by the publication of an alleged libel. The question of greatest moment involved is as to the constitutional validity of chapter 57b, Gen. Stat. 1901, being chap. 249, p. 439, Session Laws 1901, which reads as follows:

"Section 1. That before any civil action shall be brought for the publication or circulation of a libel in any newspaper in this state, the plaintiff shall, at least three days before filing the petition in such action, serve notice on the publisher or publishers of such newspaper, at the principal office of publication, specifying the statement in said article which is alleged to be false or defamatory. If it shall appear on the trial of such action that said article was published in good faith, that its falsity was due to mistake or misapprehension of the facts, and that a full and fair retraction of any statement therein contained alleged to be erroneous was published in the next regular issue of said newspaper, if a weekly or monthly, or, in case of a daily paper, within three days after such mistake or misapprehension was brought to the knowledge of such publisher or publishers, in as conspicuous a place and type in such newspaper as was the article complained of as libelous, then the plaintiff in such case shall recover only actual damages: Provided, that the provisions of this act shall not apply to the case of any libel against any candidate for a public office in this state unless the retraction is made editorially, in a conspicuous manner, at least ten days before election, in case such libelous article was published in a daily paper, and in case such libelous article was published in a weekly or monthly paper, at least fifteen days before the election: Provided further, that nothing in this act shall be held to apply to any libel published of or concerning any female person.

"Sec. 2. The words 'actual damages,' in the foregoing section, shall be construed to include all damages which the plaintiff shall show he has suffered in respect to his property, business, trade, profession, or occupation, and no other damages whatever."

This is assailed as being violative of § 18 of the Bill of Rights, which is: "All persons for injuries suffered in person, reputation, or property shall have remedy by due course of law, and justice administered without delay.

It will be noted that the questioned statute limits the right of recovery in cases of libel to actual damages, where, after service of the notice provided in the 1st section, the publisher of the newspaper in which the libelous matter has appeared shall make a full and fair retraction of the libelous matter, coupled with a showing upon the trial that the same was published in good faith, under the misapprehension of the facts; and defines that class of damages to be such as the plaintiff has suffered in respect to his property, business, trade, profession, or occupation. So that in such cases the libeled party may not recover all his damage, but he is confined to the narrow class designated and defined in the act as "actual damages." The common law recognizes two classes of damages in libel cases,—general and special. General damages are those which the law presumes must naturally, proximately, and necessarily result from the publication of the libelous matter. They arise by inference of law, and are not required to be proved by evidence. They are allowable whenever the immediate tendency of the words is to impair the plaintiff's reputation, although no actual pecuniary loss had in fact resulted; and are designed to compensate for that large and substantial class of injuries arising from injured feelings, mental suffering and anguish, and personal and public humiliation, consequent upon the malicious publication of the false and libelous matter. The injury for which this class of damages is allowed is something more than merely speculative. While not susceptible of being accurately measured in dollars and cents, it is a real one, and more often than otherwise more substantial and real than those designated as actual, and measured accurately by the dollar standard. In short, it is such an injury to the reputation as was contemplated in the Bill of Rights. The law presumes that this class of injuries resulted necessarily from the publication of the libelous matter, and the damages therefore were recoverable without special assignment. Special damages were also recoverable when properly pleaded and shown, and were such damages as were computable in money, and may be said to be fairly embraced in the list of actual damages as given in the statute referred to. This was the condition of the law at the time of the adoption of our Constitution, and is now, and these the injuries to reputation for which it provided that there should be "remedy by due course of law."

It requires no argument to demonstrate that the act in question does deny remedy for a portion of these injuries. Unless the one libeled has suffered in the particular manner pointed out in the statute, he is remediless. For that other large class of persons and still larger class of injuries no remedy is found. From the writings of the world's wisest man we have the assurance "that a good name is rather to be chosen than great riches." Yet the possessor of this thing of greatest value, being despoiled of it, is left entirely without remedy for its loss by the statute in question, except in such rare cases as he shall be able to show some exact financial injury in the particulars named. We could not excuse ourselves for holding that reputation is less valuable than property, or that it is less protected from spoliation by the quoted provision of the Bill of Rights:

It is suggested, however, that the retraction required by the act to be published is a fair compensation for the injury done, and a reinvestment of the libeled one with his good name. This being done, all has been accomplished that would be by a verdict of a jury, and hence that the retraction required by the legislative enactment is, if not "due course of law," an ample substitute for it. It is not an easy task to deduce either from reason or the authorities a satisfactory definition of "law of the land" or "due course of law." We feel safe, however, from either standpoint, in saying these terms do not mean any act that the legislature may have passed if such act does not give to one opportunity to be heard before being deprived of property, liberty, or reputation, or, having been deprived of either, does not afford a like opportunity of showing the extent of his injury, and give an adequate remedy to recover therefor. Whatever these terms may mean more than this, they do mean due and orderly procedure of courts in the ascertainment of damages for injury, to the end that the injured one "shall have remedy,"—that is, proper and adequate remedy,—thus to be ascertained. To refuse hearing and remedy for injury after its infliction is small remove from infliction of penalty before and without hearing.

In Hoke v. Henderson, 15 N. C. (4 Dev. L.) 1, 15, 25 Am. Dec. 677, Chief Justice Ruffin, in speaking to this point, says:

"Those terms 'law of the land' [or 'due course of law'] do not mean merely an act of the general assembly. If they did, every restriction upon the legislative authority would be at once abrogated. For what more can the citizen suffer than to be 'taken, imprisoned, disseised of his freehold, liberties, and privileges; be outlawed, exiled, and destroyed; and be deprived of his property, his liberty, and his life' without crime? Yet all this he may suffer if an act of assembly simply denouncing those penalties on particular persons, or a particular class of persons, be in itself a law of the land within the sense of the Constitution." Mr. Webster, in the Dartmouth College Case, has this definition: "By the law of the land is most clearly intended the general law, a law which hears before it condemns, which proceeds upon inquiry, and renders judgment only after trial. . . . Everything which may pass under the form of an enactment is not, therefore, considered to be the law of the land." Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 4 Wheat. 519, 4 L. ed. 630. See, for other definitions, People ex rel. Witherbee v. Essex County, 70 N. Y. 228; Stuart v. Palmer, 74 N. Y. 183, 30 Am. Rep. 289; State v. Billings, 55 Minn. 467, 57 N. W. 206, 794, 43 Am. St. Rep. 524; Burdick v. People, 149 Ill. 600, 24 L. R. A. 152, 41 Am. St. Rep. 329, 36 N. E. 948, 952; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. State, 47 Neb. 549, 41 L. R. A. 481, 53 Am. St. Rep. 557, 66 N. W. 624.

The retraction required by the act in question may or may not be full reparation for the injury suffered. It might the rather aggravate the injury already inflicted than mollify it. It is sufficient to say, however, that all these are questions for the courts upon proper notice to all parties, and may not be determined arbitrarily by an act of the legislature.

We find that courts of last resort in two states have passed upon the constitutionality of acts like the one here discussed. In Park v. Detroit Free Press Co. 72 Mich. 560, 1 L. R. A. 599, 16 Am. St. Rep. 544, 40 N. W. 731, the supreme court of Michigan, holding against the constitutionality, says: "We do not think the statute controls the action, or is within the power of constitutional legislation. This will, in our judgment, appear from a statement of its effect if carried out. It purports to confine recovery in certain cases against newspapers to what it calls 'actual damages,' and then defines actual damages to cover only direct pecuniary loss in certain specified ways, and none other. In some of these defined cases the proof of any damages in this sense would 64 L. R. A.

be impracticable, and in all it would be very difficult. They are confined to damages in respect to property, business, trade, profession, or occupation. It is safe to say that such losses cannot be the true damage in a very large share of the worst cases of libel. A woman who is slandered in her chastity is, under this law, usually without any redress whatever. A man whose income is from fixed investment or salary or official emolument, or business not depending upon his repute, could lose no money directly unless removed from the title to receive his income by reason of the libel, which could seldom happen. If contradicted soon, there could be practically no risk of this. And the same is true concerning most business losses. The cases must be very rare in which a libel will destroy business profits in such a way that the loss can be directly traced to the mischief. There could never be any loss when employers or customers know or believe the charges unfounded. The statute does not reach cases where a libel has operated to cut off chances of office or employment in the future, or broken up or prevented relationships not capable of an exact money standard, or produced that intangible but fatal influence which suspicion, helped by ill will, spreads beyond recall or reach by apology or retraction. Exploded lies are continually reproduced without the antidote, and no one can measure with any accurate standard the precise amount of evil done or probable. There is no room for holding, in a constitutional system, that private reputation is any more subject to be removed by statute from full legal protection than life, liberty, or property. It is one of those rights necessary to human society that underlie the whole social scheme of civilization. It is a thing which is more easily injured than restored, and where injury is capable of infinite mischief." This case has subsequently been specifically approved by the same court in McGee v. Baumgartner, 121 Mich. 287, 80 N. W. 21, where the court holds: "The right to recover in an action of libel for damages to reputation cannot be abridged by statute." A contrary view was adopted by a divided court in Allen v. Pioneer Press Co. 40 Minn. 117, 3 L. R. A. 532, 12 Am. St. Rep. 707, 41 N. W. 936. The conclusion of the court in this case is based largely upon the reasoning that the retraction being required, as it is, to be published as widely and to substantially the same readers as the original, is usually a more complete redress for the injury inflicted than would be a judgment for damages. This, however, is merely an assumpt-tion, and may or may not be true; but, even if true, this would not be "remedy by due course of law," as contemplated in the Constitution, as we have already determined. We are well persuaded that the criticised act takes from the libeled person the right of remedy by due course of law for an injury suffered in his reputation, and hence is invalid under the quoted constitutional provision.

The questions in this case arise upon the sustaining of defendant's general demurrer to plaintiff's petition. That petition contained no statement of the service of the notice as provided in the criticised act, and it is now claimed, admitting the constitutional invalidity of this act, because it denies remedy by due course of law, still the legislature would have a right to require the service as a step in the procedure in prosecuting an action for the recovery of damages occasioned by libel; this in order to give the publisher opportunity of retraction for the purpose of mitigating general damages and relieving himself from punitive damages. We do not deny that the legislature might do this. It seems to us, however, that such was not its purpose and object, but rather that the service of this notice was but a step in the procedure to relieve publishers from all general damages. That object having been found unconstitutional, these ancillary matters must go with it.

It is further suggested that the subject-matter of the alleged libel was not libelous per se, and hence that the demurrer was properly sustained, the petition containing no allegation of special damage. The libelous matter set out was in the following language: "A second case was called late this afternoon, in which John F. Hanson, of Marquette, is accused of assault on M. A. Fosberg and Louise Fosberg. It is claimed that in attempting to collect a bill he threatened violence with a pistol. The latter parties are the complaining witnesses. The decision of the case will be announced later." A libel, in order to be actionable per se, and permit a recovery without allegation and proof of special damages, must contain imputations which tend to subject the libeled one to disgrace, ridicule, or contempt. We are of the opinion that the words here counted upon are such. To threaten violence with a pistol might fairly be held to be a charge at least of an assault, maybe of a crime of greater gravity.

We find that the court was in error in sustaining defendant's demurrer; hence direct that this ruling be reversed, and the case remanded for further proceedings.

All the Justices concur.

METROPOLITAN STREET RAILWAY

*A foreign corporation is "out of the state," within the meaning of § 21 of the Code, and, for that reason, cannot avail itself of the statute of limitations of this state.

(December 12, 1903.)

ERROR to the Court of Common Pleas for Wyandotte County to review a judgment in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The agreed statement of facts on which this cause was tried in the court below was as follows:

"2d. It is agreed that the plaintiff is a widow of the age of forty-five years, and that on the 15th day of July, 1894, the plaintiff was thirty-eight years of age, and was of sound mind, and ever since has been of sound mind, and under no legal disability.

"4th. That the accident, cause of action, and injury for which this action is brought, occurred and accrued in the county of Wyandotte and state of Kansas on the 15th day of July, 1894.

"5th. That the injury and cause of action for which this action is brought is in tort for personal injuries received by the plaintiff on the 15th day of July, 1894, by reason of the negligent starting of a passenger car of the defendant by its employees, while the plaintiff, who was a passenger on such car, was alighting therefrom, whereby the plaintiff was thrown down and injured.

*Headnote by SMITH, J.

†After the original opinion was handed down in this case a petition for rehearing was filed, and the court thereupon made some few additions to the original petition, and the opinion published herewith is in its corrected form.

NOTE.—As to right of foreign corporation to plead statute of limitations, see also, in this series, Winney v. Sandwich Mfg. Co. 18 L. R. A. 524, and note; Pierce v. Southern P. Co. 40 L. R. "6th. It is further agreed that the plaintiff, by being thrown down and injured as stated in paragraph 5 hereof, was damaged in the sum of $150.

"7th. It is further agreed that the defendant is, and was at all times herein mentioned, a corporation, organized under the laws of the state of Missouri, and has its principal office in Jackson county, state of Missouri, where the board of directors meet and the president, vice president, secretary, and treasurer, chairman of the board of directors, and general superintendent reside, and have their offices. That all employees, both for the line in Kansas and Missouri, are hired in Missouri, and all supplies are purchased, and all contracts therefor are made, and all funds of the company are kept there.

"8th. That the defendant was, on the 15th day of July, 1894, ever since has been, and now is, a street railway company, engaged in carrying passengers from Kansas City, in the state of Missouri, into and through Kansas City, Argentine, and Rosedale, in Wyandotte county, Kansas, and from Kansas City, Argentine, and Rosedale, in Wyandotte county, Kansas, to Kansas City, Jackson county, Missouri.

"9th. That a large percentage, to wit, about 33¼ per cent, of all the business of said defendant company was, on the 15th day of July, 1894, ever since, has been, and now is, transacted in the county of Wyandotte and state of Kansas.

"10th. That on the 15th day of July, 1894, and for a long time prior thereto, ever since said date, and now, the defendant has owned, and every day since said 15th day of July, 1894, has regularly operated its cars over, 15 miles of double-track street railway upon and along the streets of Kansas City, Argentine, and Rosedale, in Wyandotte county, Kansas.

"11th. That the defendant's railway tracks, so laid in the streets of Kansas City, Kansas, Argentine, and Rosedale, and the operation of its cars thereon are authorized by and pursuant to contracts and stipulations contained in ordinances and franchises granted to said defendants by the cities of Kansas City, Argentine, and Rosedale, all cities of Wyandotte county, Kansas.

"13th. That upon the 15th day of July, 1894, and constantly ever since said date, the defendant has had in charge of its car barns and offices mentioned in paragraph 12 hereof, a division superintendent and assistant division superintendent, both day and night.

"14th. That the division superintendent and the assistant division superintendent, mentioned in paragraph 13 hereof, have at all times mentioned herein had charge of all property of the defendant in Wyandotte county, and have had offices in said car barns where the employees engaged in the operation of the defendant company's cars on the divisions of which they are division superintendents, report each day to said division superintendent, and by him are directed in the management and operation of said cars in Kansas, and in which also has been and is transacted by said division superintendents all business transacted in Wyandotte county, Kansas, relative to the management and operation of said railway and the maintenance of said company's cars and lines of railway in said county and state, subject to the general supervision and control of their superior officers in Kansas City, Missouri.

"15th. That this action was commenced in said court on the 1st day of June, 1901, and service in this cause was made upon the assistant division superintendent in charge of the station and office of the defendant at 10th street and Minnesota avenue, mentioned in paragraph 12 hereof."

Judgment was entered in favor of the defendant. Plaintiff in error has come to this court by proceedings in error.

Messrs. Getty, Hutchings, & Dean, for plaintiff in error:

The running of the statute of limitations depends, not on the residence or nonresidence of the party who invokes it, but on his presence in, or absence from, the state.

Lane v. National Bank, 6 Kan. 74; Investment Securities Co. v. Bergthold, 60 Kan. 813, 58 Pac. 469.

A corporation can have no legal existence outside of the state where it is created.

In view of the decisions establishing beyond question that a corporation cannot leave the state of its creation, how could the defendant in error, a Missouri corporation, be present in the state of Kansas? It is settled that it cannot.

In many of the states the running of the statute depends on the residence of the party invoking it; in others it depends on whether service could be obtained on such party. In this state neither of these facts is material.

Messrs. Miller, Buchan, & Morris, for defendant in error:

A corporation is a citizen of the state of its incorporation, but it is present in any state, and can be present or absent from any state, only as its agents, officers, and business are present or absent therefrom.

Lane v. National Bank, 6 Kan. 74; Hoggett v. Emerson, 8 Kan. 262; Coale v. Campbell, 58 Kan. 484, 49 Pac. 604.

The fact that the defendant is a nonresident of Kansas is unimportant, and the whole question is, Can a corporation organized under the laws of another state be present in Kansas within the meaning of our limitation statute?

A foreign corporation which has acquired a domicile in the state for the purpose of litigation is not a nonresident so as to suspend the operation of limitation.

Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Fricke, 99 Wis. 367, 41 L. R. A. 557, 74 N. W. 372, 78 N. W. 407; 6 Thomp. Corp. § 7841.

The full object and purpose of our law have been subserved when a plaintiff for the full period of limitation has been in a position to sue upon his claim and recover a personal judgment against the defendant.

Personal service and binding personal judgments can be had upon any foreign corporation doing business in this state, so long as it has agents and places of business here.

If, under the laws of the domestic state, the corporation has placed itself in such position that it may be served with process, it may avail itself of the statute of limitations when sued. Ability to obtain service of process is the test of the running of the statute of limitations.

On rehearing.

The decision is in conflict with the decisions in State v. Bogardus, 63 Kan. 259, 65 Pac. 251, and Bristol v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 15 Ill. 436.

It is also in conflict with an express statute.

Gen. Stat. 1901, § 1267.

It is in conflict with the principle necessarily deducible from J. B. Watkins Land Mortg. Co. v. Elliott, 62 Kan. 291, 84 Am. St. Rep. 385, 62 Pac. 1004.

Smith, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The sole question involved is, whether a foreign corporation transacting business in this state can plead the statute of limitations in bar of a cause of action originating here in favor of a resident plaintiff. The statutory language applicable to the case is as follows: "If, when a cause of action accrues against a person, he be out of the state, . . . the period limited for the commencement of the action shall not begin to run until he comes into the state; . . . and if, after a cause of action accrues, he depart from the state, . . . the time of his absence . . . shall not be computed as any part of the period within which the action must be brought." Gen. Stat. 1901, § 4449.

By the 13th paragraph of § 7342 it is provided that the word "person" may be extended to corporate bodies.

It is the contention of counsel for defendant in error that, because, at the time of the injury to plaintiff below, the street railway company was doing business in Kansas, and had a superintendent here on whom process could be served, and so continued to transact business and maintain an office in this state until the action was begun, for the purpose of invoking the bar of the statute of limitations it cannot be held that the corporation was out of the state during said time.

In Lane v. National Bank, 6 Kan. 74, it was held that the personal absence of the debtor from the state, even if he retained a residence here at which process against him might be served, was sufficient to take the case out of the statute. This case has been reaffirmed repeatedly. Hoggett v. Emerson, 8 Kan. 262; Morrell v. Ingle, 23 Kan. 32; Conlon v. Lamphear, 37 Kan. 431, 15 Pac. 600; Anent v. Lovenikall, 52 Kan. 706, 35 Pac. 804; Coale v. Campbell, 58 Kan. 480, 484, 49 Pac. 604; Investment Securities Co. v. Bergthold, 60 Kan. 813, 58 Pac. 469.

In the early case of Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Pet. 519, 588, 10 L. ed. 274, 307, Chief Justice Taney said: "It is very true that a corporation can have no legal existence out of the boundaries of the sovereignty of which it is created. It exists only in contemplation of law, and by force of the law; and where that law ceases to operate, and is no longer obligatory, the corporation can have no existence. It must dwell in the place of its creation, and cannot migrate to another sovereignty."

Counsel for the street railway company are in error when they assert that this case has been overruled by St. Clair v. Cox, 106 U. S. 350, 27 L. ed. 222, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 354. The last decision went no farther than to hold that an Illinois corporation could not be subject to a judgment in personam in Michigan, unless at the time of service of summons it was doing business in the latter state.

In Shaw v. Quincy Min. Co. 145 U. S. 444, 450, 36 L. ed. 768, 772, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 935, Mr. Justice Gray, after quoting the above language of Chief Justice Taney, says: "This statement has been often reaffirmed by this court, with some change of phrase, but always retaining the idea that the legal existence, the home, the domicile, the habitat, the residence, the citizenship, of the corporation can only be in the state by which it was created, although it may do business in other states whose laws permit it." In the same opinion the words of Mr. Justice Curtis in Lafayette Ins. Co. v. French, 18 How. 404, 15 L. ed. 451, are approved, where he said: "This corporation, existing only by virtue of a law of Indiana, cannot be deemed to pass personally beyond the limits of that state." See Clark & M. Priv. Corp. p. 356.

In Land Grant R. & Trust Co. v. Coffey County, 6 Kan. 245, 253, Mr. Justice Valentine, speaking for the court, said: "A corporation, in order to have any legal or valid existence, must have a home, a domicile, a principal place of doing business, within the boundaries of the state which creates it. It may send agents into other states to do business, but it cannot migrate in a body. If it attempts to migrate in a body, to go beyond the jurisdiction of the laws which bind and hold it together, it dissolves into its original elements, and the persons who comprise it become only individuals. And even where a corporation has a legal and valid existence in its own state, the only recognition that other states will give to it is such as the rules of courtesy and comity between states require.

The corporation sued in this action, like all others, is, in the words of Chief Justice Marshall, "an artificial being, invisible, intangible, and existing only in contemplation of law."

In State ex rel. Godard v. Topeka Water Co. 61 Kan. 547, 558, 60 Pac. 337, it is said: "A corporation exists by the will of a sovereign power. To this superior authority it owes an allegiance which it cannot abjure."

If the Metropolitan Street Railway Company was, in contemplation of law, present in this state from May, 1894, until June, 1901, then the action was barred. The corporation was sued. It is not contended that the body corporate moves itself into this state, but that, having agents here, their presence, while transacting business in its behalf, amounted to the presence of the corporation itself within the meaning of the statutes of limitation above set out. If, as stated by Chief Justice Taney, a corporation cannot migrate from one state to another, then the intangible body which was sued in this action was at all times absent from this state and present in the state of Missouri. In Tioga R. Co. v. Blossburg & C. R. Co. 20 Wall. 137, 149, 22 L. ed. 331, 337, Mr. Justice Hunt said: "We do not say that a corporation cannot run its cars in a state other than that where it is incorporated and where it is domiciled, nor that it cannot by its lawful agents make contracts and do other business in such state. We assume that it can. In doing these things it does not lose its residence in the former state, nor become a resident of the latter. It still resides in the state where it is incorporated, and does not depart therefrom."

The language above quoted was used when the court was considering the effect of a section of the New York statute of limitations exactly like ours. It is true, as counsel state, that in the case last referred to it was held by a majority of the court that in New York no personal judgment can be obtained against a foreign corporation by service on its officers or agents, although it may be doing business in that state. We do not conclude, however, that a different result would have been reached had the law there permitted a valid personal judgment to be rendered, based on service on the corporation's agents in New York.

In the brief of counsel for the street railway company it is said: "The full object and purpose of our law have been subverted when a plaintiff for the full period of limitation has been in a position to sue upon his claim and recover a personal judgment against the defendant." The same argument was made in behalf of Senator Lane in 6 Kan. 74, supra, who maintained a residence at Lawrence, in this state, where personal service could have been had by leaving a copy of the summons under § 64 of the Code, and a personal judgment obtained thereon, which would be good everywhere. The court, however, held that the statute of limitations, which excludes the time during which the debtor is absent from the state, should receive the natural meaning the words used import. The plaintiff in the Lane Case was in no wise obstructed or delayed in bringing his action by the absence of the debtor in Washington, for, during the whole time of such absence, he could have obtained service of summons as valid in all respects as if had personally on Mr. Lane in this state.

North Missouri R. Co. v. Akers, 4 Kan. 453, 475, 96 Am. Dec. 183, was an action against a Missouri railroad corporation for breach of contract. The latter pleaded the statute of limitations. The court said: "The reply to the plea of the statute of limitations was that the defendant was a foreign corporation, created and existing under the laws of Missouri, and having no corporate existence under the laws of Kansas. And there was testimony absolutely proving these allegations. So that the assumption of fact in the instruction is hardly sustained by the record. But we have already attempted to show that a corporation is a person under the Code, and, within the meaning of § 28,—an artificial being, a corporate body, confined to the state of Missouri, where it remained, until this suit was brought, for aught that appears from the record,—and is subject to the exceptions enumerated in § 28 of the Code. To hold otherwise would be to say that the legislature intended to discriminate in favor of a foreign corporation without any just grounds for such a conclusion. We think the principle of this instruction was settled by the court in the case of Bonifant v. Doniphan, 3 Kan. 35, and against the plaintiff in error."

There was no showing, however, in the case referred to that the foreign corporation had at any time transacted business in this state. The court based its decision on the authority of Bonifant v. Doniphan, 3 Kan. 26, which first adopted the construction of the limitation statute afterwards adhered to in the Lane Case and others cited above. It will be noted that the court applied the language of § 4449 of the present statute, supra, to an artificial being,—a corporate body, and gave it the same effect as if an absent individual was defendant in the action. The same application of the statute was made in Etina L. Ins. Co. v. Koons, 26 Kan. 215, the third paragraph of the syllabus reading: "Where the petition alleges that the defendant is a foreign insurance corporation, created and existing under the laws of Connecticut, with its principal office in the city of Hartford, in that state, it sufficiently appears therefrom that the defendant is a nonresident, and not present in the state, and an objection upon the ground that the cause of action therein set forth is barred by the statute of limitations, is not well taken, because the exceptions enumerated in § 21 of the Code apply."

A corporation must be thought of without reference to the members who compose it. The latter may die, but the body corporate does not. While a valid judgment may be taken against a corporation in this state by service here on its officers or agents transacting business for it, yet such fact does not compel us to hold that within the meaning of our limitation law it is personally present in the state when served. In the Case of Senator Lane a valid personal judgment could have been obtained against him by his creditor by service of summons left at his usual place of residence in Kansas, although at the time he was temporarily absent in Washington in discharge of his official duties. In Foster-Cherry Commission Co. v. Caskey, 66 Kan. 600, 72 Pac. 268, it was held that, although the principal business of a foreign corporation was transacted in this state, such fact did not authorize the taxation of its capital stock here. The case of Com. v. Standard Oil Co. 101 Pa. 119, 146, is quoted from: "The domicile of the Standard Oil Company is in the state of Ohio. Being a corporation, it is an invisible, artificial, and intangible thing. When it sent its agents to this state to transact business, it no more entered the state in point of fact than any other foreign corporation, firm, or individual who sends an agent here to open an office or branch house."

Wisconsin has a limitation statute like ours. The clause relevant here reads: "If, when the cause of action shall accrue against any person, he shall be out of this state, such action may be commenced within the terms respectively limited (six years) after such person shall return or remove to this state." This provision was held to apply to the temporary absence of a resident of the state, although during such absence a summons might have been served by leaving it at his usual place of abode. Parker v. Kelly, 61 Wis. 552, 555, 21 N. W. 539. Following this, in Larson v. Aultman & T. Co. 86 Wis. 281, 286, 39 Am. St. Rep. 893, 56 N. W. 915, it was decided that a foreign corporation came within the purview of the limitation statute above quoted. The court said that, the word "person" being applicable to corporations as well as to individuals, it was obvious that when the cause of action accrued the corporation was "out of the state." In Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Fricke, 99 Wis. 367, 41 L. R. A. 557, 74 N. W. 372, 78 N. W. 407, the case of Larson v. Aultman & T. Co. 86 Wis. 281, 286, 39 Am. St. Rep. 893, 56 N. W. 915, was followed. On a motion for rehearing, it was said: "The appellant argued that . . . a foreign corporation which has acquired a domicile in this state for the purpose of litigation is not a nonresident in such sense as to suspend the operation of the statute of limitations against it. 6 Thomp. Corp. § 7841. The motion was denied."

In most of the cases cited by counsel for defendant in error the right of a foreign corporation to plead the statute of limitations is made to depend on whether valid service could be had on it in the state where sued. See Winney v. Sandvick Mfg. Co. 86 Iowa, 608, 18 L. R. A. 524, 53 N. W. 421; Turcott v. Yazoo & M. Valley R. Co. 101 Tenn. 102, 40 L. R. A. 768, 70 Am. St. Rep. 661, 45 S. W. 1067. As we have shown, such is not the test in this state. The last case cited expressly recognizes that the doctrine contended for by defendant in error does not obtain in Kansas. It may be said that a foreign corporation doing business in this state through agents is constructively present here for the purposes of valid service of summons on it, although it is actually out of the state. Merchants' Mfg. Co. v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 21 Blatchf. 109, 13 Fed. 358.

The constructive presence of Senator Lane in Kansas at his place of abode in Lawrence, where valid service might have been had, did not avail him during his actual absence from the state.

An examination of the decisions of different states on the subject in hand will disclose that in almost all of them, where it has been held that a foreign corporation situated like defendant in error may invoke the limitation laws of the jurisdiction where it is sued, statutory provisions differing from ours exist. A notable exception, however, is found in Nebraska, where, under a statute like Gen. Stat. 1901 § 4449, supra, the doctrine of the Lane Case and others cited above is denied. In Bauserman v. Blunt, 147 U. S. 647, 657, 37 L. ed. 316, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 466, the court said: "But what may be the law of Nebraska is immaterial. The case at bar is governed by the law of Kansas, and the duty of this court to follow, as a rule of decision, the settled construction by the highest court of Kansas of a statute of that state is not affected by the adoption of a different construction of a similar statute in Nebraska, or in any other state." On the question involved, see also Boardman v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 84 N. Y. 157, and cases cited; State v. National Acci. Soc. 103 Wis. 208, 79 N. W. 220; Hanchett v. Blair, 41 C. C. A. 76, 100 Fed. 817; Barstow v. Union Consol. Silver Min. Co. 10 Nev. 386; Clarke v. Bank of Mississippi, 10 Ark. 516, 52 Am. Dec. 248.

Whether foreign corporations which have purchased or leased railroads in this state, as provided in Gen. Stat. 1901, § 5871, are affected by the principle involved in this case, we do not decide.

The judgment of the court below will be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

MARYLAND COURT OF APPEALS.

Sody SALABES, Appt.,
v.
Jacob CASTELBERG et al.
(.....Md.....)

1. A ring for the finger, although an article of personal adornment, is a proper subject for a chattel mortgage.
2. A sufficient description of a diamond ring for the purpose of a chattel mortgage is effected by specifying the weight of the stone, the style of setting, and the house where the owner resides and the ring is to be kept.
3. A statute requiring a mortgagee to warrant that he will not require the mortgagor to pay the tax imposed by statute upon the interest payable under the mortgage is not applicable to a mortgage under which no interest is payable, either directly or indirectly.
4. A promise by a chattel mortgagee, who has a right to possession of the mortgaged property because of the default of the mortgagor, that, in case the mortgagor will surrender a pawn ticket representing the property, the mortgagee will redeem the property, cancel the mortgage, and consider the transaction closed, is without avail to the one who issued the pawn ticket with constructive notice of the rights of the mortgagee; since, having the exclusive right to the possession of the property, his promise is without consideration, and it is the duty of the pawnee, and not that of the mortgagee, to protect his interest by redemption.
5. A party cannot complain of the granting of prayers for his opponent which did not authorize a recovery of anything more than might be recovered under prayers offered by himself.

(February 19, 1904.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court of Baltimore City in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover damages for the conversion of a ring alleged to belong to plaintiffs. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Benjamin Rosenheim, for appellant:

The description of the ring was indefinite and uncertain.

NOTE.—The objection made in the case above to the validity of a chattel mortgage on the ground that the property mortgaged was an article worn on the person presents a somewhat novel question, on which this decision seems to be one of first impression.

An article of wearing apparel, or an ornament which adorns the person, and which attends the person in his daily walks of life, is not the subject of a chattel mortgage.

Leiris v. Stevenson, 2 Hall, 63.

The mortgage is invalid as to third persons because of the absence of an affidavit of the mortgagee, indorsed thereon, that the mortgagor was not required to pay the tax levied upon the interest.

Having, in fact, received from Linthicum the pawn ticket, which was by its terms transferable upon the faith of their promise to redeem the pledge, and to cancel the mortgage from them to Linthicum, the appellees thereby became liable to the appellant for the advances from the appellant to Linthicum, and, at the same time, ratified the pledge.

George v. Andrews, 60 Md. 33, 45 Am. Rep. 706; Stokes v. Detrick, 75 Md. 256, 23 Atl. 846.

The mortgagees (appellees) having received the sum of $68 from Linthicum on account of the purchase money for the ring, and also the pawn ticket, or receipt, with the express understanding that they were to pay to the appellant the amount of the advance, and the mortgage was to be considered extinguished, ought not, in equity and good conscience, to be permitted to violate their agreement.

Boyd, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellees sued the appellant in trover for the conversion to his own use of a diamond ring, which one William B. Linthicum had mortgaged to them. The mortgage is dated the 27th of October, 1900, and was given to secure the sum of $120, payable in weekly instalments of $2 per week. Linthicum had paid the appellees $68, and the verdict was for only $52, being the balance due. On the 11th of December, 1900, Linthicum obtained $65 on the ring from the appellant, who was a pawnbroker, and on September 20, 1901, a new ticket was issued for that sum, which was payable in six months. There are six bills of exception in the record, the first five presenting rulings of the court below on the admissibility of testimony, and the sixth embracing the prayers.

1. The first was to the ruling of the court 64 L. R. A.

in admitting the mortgage in evidence, to which the defendant objected because (a) the description of the property in the mortgage is too indefinite and uncertain; (b) a ring, being an article of personal adornment, cannot be the subject of a chattel mortgage; (c) there was not annexed to the mortgage an affidavit of the mortgagees that they did not require the mortgagor to pay the tax levied upon the interest, etc. These objections were based on the theory that the appellant claimed to be (and the record does not show the contrary) in the position of an innocent purchaser for value, without actual notice of the mortgage; and he does not contend that the mortgage would not be valid between the parties. We must therefore consider the question from the standpoint of an innocent third person who had no notice of the mortgage, except such constructive notice as results from the recording of it. If the appellant is right in his position that a ring cannot be the subject of a chattel mortgage, that will end the controversy, and we will therefore first consider it.

The general rule is that all personal property capable of being sold, can be mortgaged. 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 974; 6 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 1037. Our testamentary law contemplates jewelry being included in the appraisalment of a decedent's estate (Code Pub. Gen. Laws, art. 93, § 217), and we have no statute that in any wise interferes with the owner mortgaging or making other disposition of it. A "chattel" is defined in Bouvier's Law Dictionary to be "every species of property, movable or immovable, which is less than a freehold;" and the same definition is given, in substance, in Devocmon v. Devocmon, 43 Md. 347. In Bouvier it is also said that "personal chattels are properly things movable, which may be carried about by the owner, such as animals, household stuff, money, jewels, corn, garments, and everything else that can be put in motion and transferred from one place to another." As a diamond ring is manifestly within the definition of a chattel, there would seem to be no valid reason, in the absence of a statute prohibiting it, why such property cannot be the subject of a chattel mortgage. Under our statute a mortgage of personal property must be recorded in the county or city where the mortgagor resides within twenty days from its date, or, if he resides out of the state, it must be recorded in the county or city where the property is located (Code Pub. Gen. Laws, art. 21, §§ 44, 45), and the statute was complied with in that respect in this case. Anyone dealing with that class of property takes more or less risk, but he can protect himself to some extent by making inquiries of the owner and examining the records where he lives, etc.

So, without further extending the discussion of that question, we are of the opinion that a diamond ring may be the subject of a chattel mortgage.

The description given in the mortgage is: "The following property and chattels: One single stone diamond ring, Tiffany setting, diamond weighing 7-8 1-64 Karats 6583 lahs." It also provided "that the aforesaid chattels shall until default be retained by the mortgagor in the city of Baltimore, state of Maryland, at No. 703 Portland street, and they shall not be removed without the written consent of the mortgagees." In 6 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 1022, it is said, in an article by Mr. Jones, the well-known author on this and other subjects, that "as against third persons the mortgage must point out the subject-matter so that the third person may identify the property covered by the aid of such inquiries as the instrument itself suggests;" and many cases are cited in the notes. In 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 956, the rule is stated thus: "If the description in a chattel mortgage is such as will enable third persons to identify the property, aided by the inquiries which the mortgage itself indicates and directs, the mortgage, when recorded, is constructive notice to parties purchasing in good faith and for a valuable consideration." The description of this ring, as given in the mortgage, was certainly "such as will enable third persons to identify the property, aided by the inquiries which the mortgage itself indicates and directs." The appellant testified that there were no marks of identification on the ring, and that the only way he could determine the weight would be to remove the stone from the setting, and weigh it on a diamond scale; that any other judgment would be only guesswork. He also explained that by Tiffany setting is meant one that was first made by Mr. Tiffany of New York, and it had taken its name from him; "but every jeweler in the United States manufactures that setting." That was perhaps rather a broad statement, but, if it be correct, it would seem to be difficult to describe a ring like this more accurately than was done in this mortgage. In answer to a question by the court as to whether a witness, who was a clerk of the appellant, could suggest any way by which a fuller description could be made, he replied: "I think the ring could have been distinguished as a Tiffany setting, giving the weight of the thing complete as it was, and giving the finger size of the ring, which would be a more accurate description. Even that would not be sufficient to identify the ring after it had been away probably three months from the original owner." The means of identification suggested by this witness do not seem to be much, if any, more accurate than those adopted by the appellees; indeed, when it is remembered that the number of the residence of the mortgagor on Portland street, in the city of Baltimore, is given, together with the other description, it would be difficult to make it more accurate. The record does not explain the meaning of "6583 lahs," but it was shown that the ring pawned by Linthicum is the same one that was purchased from the appellees, and if the appellant had examined the records he would have received such information as to put him on inquiry to further identify the ring. This case differs materially from that of Fesener v. Bradley, 87 Md. 488, 40 Atl. 58. There the bill of sale simply described the property as "one-half interest in eight horses," without saying where they were or giving any other description of them. We said: "Property of that character should be described with at least reasonable certainty. The age, color, name, some distinctive mark, or something by which the animal could be to some extent identified, should be given." And so the vehicles there referred to were capable of more definite description than was given. But in this case, as the only description that could reasonably be expected was given, and that was ample to put persons dealing with the ring on inquiry, the mortgagees should not be made to suffer. It is not pretended that the appellant was misled by the description that was given, and if he had read the mortgage, and had seen that Wm. B. Linthicum, who lived at 703 Portland street, in the city of Baltimore, had undertaken to secure the appellees by mortgaging a ring such as is described, it would have been utterly inexcusable in him to accept such a ring from the same Wm. B. Linthicum. Any person of ordinary intelligence would be warned by the information given in the mortgage not to accept such a ring as is therein described from Linthicum, and, after all, that is the great object in recording chattel mortgages. Pawnbrokers might protect themselves, as well as owners of property and mortgagees, from the fraudulent conduct of those pawning goods by making more thorough inquiries than seem to have been made in this case. The ticket issued by the appellant, which is made transferable on its face, gives a much more indefinite description than is found in the mortgage. We are of the opinion that the description was sufficient, and the recording of the mortgage was constructive notice to the appellant.

Nor do we think that the failure to annex to the mortgage an affidavit of the mortgagees that they did not require the mortgagor to pay the tax levied upon the interest, etc., invalidates it. There is no covenant to pay any interest in the mortgage. It was given to secure the payment of the purchase money, which was payable in instalments. Section 146A of article 81 (Acts 1898, chap. 313, p. 885), requires mortgagees to "annually pay a tax of 8 per centum upon the gross amount of interest covenanted to be paid each year to said mortgagee or his assigns by the mortgagor." Section 146D of that article (Acts 1898, chap. 275, p. 819), as in force when the mortgage was given, provided for any person lending money on mortgage upon property in this state making affidavit "to the effect that he has not required the mortgagor, his agent or attorney, or any person for the said mortgagor, to pay the tax levied upon the interest warranted to be paid in advance, nor will he require the same to be paid by the mortgagor or any person for him during the existence of said mortgage." The word "warranted" was evidently intended to be "covenanted," and this section, as amended by act 1902, chap. 26, p. 33, uses the latter term. There was no interest provided for in this mortgage, and hence the provision requiring the affidavit is not applicable. We do not mean to say that, if interest was included in these payments, the statute could not be applied merely because the parties covered it up by putting it in the form of principal, although it was in fact interest: but there is no evidence of that, and, so far as the case is presented by the record, it was simply a mortgage to secure the purchase money, payable in instalments, and does not provide for the payment of any interest. It is therefore unnecessary to consider Acts 1902, chap. 102, p. 124, which is "An Act to Make Valid Mortgages and Assignments of Mortgages Defectively Sworn to and Recorded since the Tenth day of April, in the Year Nineteen Hundred," or other questions affecting this branch of the case.

2. The second and fourth bills of exception can be considered together. The defendant offered to prove by Linthicum, the mortgagor, that in June, 1901, one of the mortgagees agreed with him that if he would give them the pawn ticket for the ring they would pay the amount advanced thereon by the defendant, that the mortgage should be considered settled, the transaction extinguished, and that he (Linthicum) did in fact give the pawn ticket to one of the mortgagees. The same testimony was offered to be proven by Mrs. Linthicum, and on objection the court refused to allow that evidence to be given, and its rulings are presented by these two bills of exception. It is difficult to understand upon what theory that testimony could have been admissible under the circumstances of this case. There can be no doubt that at that time Linthicum was in default under the terms of the mortgage, and the appellees were entitled to the possession of the ring. It was clearly the duty of Linthicum to surrender the pawn ticket if that in any way interfered with the appellees getting possession of it. The mortgage provided that on default of payment of any instalment, "or if the mortgagor shall sell or assign said chattels or any part thereof, then the whole debt shall, at the option of the mortgagees, without notice of said option to anyone, and without demand, become at once due and payable, and the said mortgagees shall thereupon have the right, without any demand whatsoever, to take possession of said property," etc. After providing for a sale of the property, paying all costs and charges, etc., it concludes: "No stipulation herein contained shall be deemed rescinded as against said mortgagee, unless such rescission is in writing and signed by said mortgagee." Linthicum was expressly prohibited from selling or assigning the ring, and therefore the appellant had no right to accept it from him, and if he chose to do so in opposition to the terms of the mortgage, of which we have said he had constructive notice, he must take the consequences, at least in a suit at law. It is true that Linthicum had an equity of redemption, and the appellant as his assignee could likewise have redeemed the ring, but he could not have done that without paying the appellees the balance due them on the mortgage. Although this is a suit at law, the appellees have only demanded of the appellant what he would have been required to do in equity, and therefore he is not injured by the verdict.

3. In view of what we have already said, it would be useless to discuss the third and fifth exceptions, and it is only necessary to say that the court was right in those rulings. The appellant has no reason to complain of the prayers granted for the plaintiffs, which limited the right of recovery to the principal still due the mortgagees, and then only provided the jury found that that amount did not exceed the value of the ring. The prayer offered by the defendant himself contained everything that was necessary to enable the plaintiffs to recover what they did. It instructed the jury that, if they found that the plaintiffs sold the ring to Linthicum for $120, and to secure the purchase money Linthicum executed and delivered the mortgage, and that he had paid $68 on account of the purchase money, "then the plaintiffs are entitled to recover, and, in estimating the damage or amount to which the said plaintiffs shall be entitled, they shall deduct from the amount of said one hundred and twenty dollars ($120) the amount paid by the said William B. Linthicum on account thereof." That is precisely what the jury did, and did not even allow interest.

It is unnecessary to discuss the other questions suggested by counsel, although they have shown great industry and ability in presenting them. Under our view of the case they need not be determined, and the judgment will be affirmed for the reasons we have given.

Judgment affirmed, the appellants to pay the costs.

MISSISSIPPI SUPREME COURT.

Myra B. MAYES.

(.....Miss.....)

The owner of trees in a highway has no right of action for the necessary trimming of them for the installation of an electric-lighting system for the municipality, which has full authority to establish the same, and full jurisdiction over the highway within its limits.

(March 7, 1904.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Copiah County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged wrongful cutting of plaintiff's trees. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. S. Sexton, for appellant:

Shade trees in the public streets of a city are the property of the municipality, and it has complete control over them, and may, therefore, destroy them, when necessary, in the progress of constructing a sidewalk.

Mr. R. N. Miller for appellee.

Truly, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The town of Hazlehurst, through its board of mayor and aldermen, decided to construct a municipal waterworks and electric-light system. In the construction of this plant it became necessary to establish and locate a system of posts and wires over the streets of the town. In the course of this work the contractor who was installing the plant found that the wires were interfered with by shade trees planted along the sidewalks of the public streets. The difficulty being reported to the municipal authorities, permission was granted the contractor and his employees to trim, whenever necessary, all trees which were on the line of the electric-light wires. In so doing five shade and ornamental trees located between the sidewalk and the public street in front of appellee's residence were, contrary to her wishes, trimmed, and in consequence thereof their symmetry was marred, and their value as shade trees diminished. For this damage appellee sued, and the jury awarded her a verdict in the sum of $125. The appellant defended on two grounds: First, that the cutting was inflicted by the employees of an independent contractor, and that, therefore, the town was not liable: second, that this was a legitimate exercise of the power of the municipality in pursuance of the authority and jurisdiction granted it by law over the public streets of the town. Appellant asked that these two phases of its defense be presented to the jury by appropriate instructions, but these were by the court refused, and the case was at last submitted to the jury on the sole question of what amount of compensatory damages the appellee was entitled to recover.

The second contention presents the question of prime importance. By § 2947 of the Revised Code of 1892 all municipalities in this state operating thereunder are granted authority "to exercise full jurisdiction in the matter of streets, . . . to open and lay out and construct the same; to repair, maintain, pave, sprinkle, adorn, and light the same;" and by § 2964 the additional power is granted to towns "to provide for the lighting of streets, parks, and public grounds, and the erection of lamps and lamp-posts." The power of municipalities over the streets within their limits has been the subject of repeated judicial inquiry. In this state it has been decided that the rule was the same whether the fee in the highway was vested in the municipality or in the abutting owner, and in either event the rights of the abutting owner in reference thereto were protected. It has also been held that the abutting owner was entitled to recover compensation for any additional servitude which might be placed on his property by the use of the highway. In Theobald v. Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co. 66 Miss. 279, 4 L. R. A. 735, 14 Am. St. Rep. 564, 6 So. 230, the supreme court said that the establishment of a steam railroad upon the street was such an additional servitude as entitled the abutting owner in front of whose property the railroad was constructed to recover damages, and the application of the same rule has been announced in reference to both telegraph and telephone companies. Stowers v. Postal Teleg. Cable Co. 68 Miss. 562, 12 L. R. A. 864, 24 Am. St. Rep. 290, 9 So. 356; Cumberland Teleph. & Teleg. Co. v. Cassidy, 78 Miss. 668, 29 So. 762. The real rule of right in the premises, as we understand it, is this: Whether the fee be or not in the abutting owner, he is entitled to free ingress and egress to his property, and to the customary use of the street, and has the right to be compensated for any additional servitude which may be placed on his property by any use of the highway not incidental or necessary to its full enjoyment as such by the public. This brings up for decision the question of what is and what is not a necessary equipment for the public convenience. In Gulf Coast Ice & Mfg. Co. v. Bowers, 80 Miss. 581, 32 So. 114, in an admirably clear and lucid opinion, Terral, J., after a full collation of all the authorities, announced that lighting of the streets by the municipality was a reasonable and legitimate exercise of municipal authority, and that the abutting owner was not entitled to recover for the inconvenience or damage occasioned by the location in front of his property of the necessary poles and wires of an electric light company which had been contracted with by the municipality for public lighting. We cannot do better than to quote, as applicable to this case, and to a great degree controlling it, the following language from that opinion: "The authorities are quite uniform that a city or town may light its streets as a means of making them more safe and convenient for public travel. The right to light the town is presumed to have been acquired and paid for, as incident to the right of public passage, when the property was condemned or dedicated for public use. In other words, the taking of the land for use as a street includes, not only the right of passage, but of securing a convenient and safe passage; to light it, if you please, for that purpose. It is not a new taking of property for public use, but a completing to that extent of the uses of the first taking by adding appliances included within it, and now constructed by reason of the public need. . . . While the lighting of the streets of a city may be a great convenience to the traveling public, especially under some conditions, the poles, wires, and other necessary appliances for so doing are often a positive inconvenience to the abutting landowner, considered merely as such. But the proprietary rights of the landowner, whether the fee or a mere easement thereon be in the public . . . are greatly modified by the rights of the public, which is entitled to a free passage over the streets, and to the benefit of lights constructed and operated for that end." It should be noted that the language of the charter there under review was not so broad in its grant of authority as are the statutory provisions hereinbefore quoted, and under which the town of Hazlehurst operated. The reason for the distinction thus clearly drawn between electric-light wires and telephone and telegraph wires, though the equipment in each instance is practically the same, is obvious. Lights are convenient, often necessary, to insure the full and complete use by the public of the streets as highways. Lighting is incidental to their use, and therefore the abutting owner is held to have been fully compensated when the highway was originally acquired. But telephone and telegraph systems, while often public conveniences, are not incidental to the use of the streets as highways, and the enjoyment and use of the street as such is not increased by such equipment. All such equipments constitute a diversion of the highway from the purposes for which it was originally designed, and hence are an additional burden on the easement. As said in Stowers v. Postal Tele. Cable Co. 68 Miss. 562, 12 L. R. A. 864, 24 Am. St. Rep. 290, 9 So. 356, they "form no part of the equipment of a public street, but are foreign to its use." For any diversion from the original purpose, for any additional servitude imposed by an equipment foreign to its use, for any new or additional taking for public use, or for consequential damages inflicted by an improper use, the abutting owner is entitled to full compensation, because such rights are not presumed to have been acquired by the original taking. But, as the public use is the dominant and controlling interest, the streets may be devoted to any proper use incident to a public thoroughfare, and the adjacent owner must suffer the resulting injury or inconvenience. So that the authorities of a municipality may, when its charter powers permit, on its streets dig drains lay gas pipes or water mains, construct sewers, or erect posts and wires for lights, because such things and other incidental uses are within the contemplated scope of the dedication of the highways to the public use. Briefly stated, the municipality has the power to make such legitimate use of the highway as is for the benefit of the community at large, and may, without additional compensation to the abutting owner, place any equipments or appliances in the streets which are necessary, convenient, or incidental to their full use and enjoyment as such. Gulf Coast Ice & Mfg. Co. v. Bowers, and authorities there cited; Elliott, Roads & Streets, 2d ed. § 707; Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 697. If, then, it be true that a municipality having proper charter power is authorized to establish an electric light plant without being liable to the abutting owners for any damages consequent upon such construction and subsequent maintenance, it necessarily follows that it is vested with authority to remove from the streets any obstruction of any kind which interferes with the construction of such equipment. And this rule is also based upon the fundamental principle that the rights of the adjacent owners are subordinate to 64 L. R. A.

the public interest. As the municipality has the right to establish the electric-light wires and posts, the citizen's right to maintain trees upon the highways is subordinate, and must yield thereto. Keasbey, Electric Wires, 2d ed. § 106; Smith, Modern Law of Mun. Corp. § 1311; Wyant v. Central Teleph. Co. 123 Mich. 51, 47 L. R. A. 497, 81 Am. St. Rep. 155, 81 N. W. 928; Tate v. Greensboro, 114 N. C. 392, 24 L. R. A. 671, 19 S. E. 767; Wilson v. Simmons, 89 Me. 242, 36 S. E. 380; Vanderhurst v. Tholcke, 113 Cal. 147, 35 L. R. A. 267, 45 Pac. 266. Cases might arise when, on account of malicious and unnecessary destruction of trees on the sidewalk, the abutting owner could maintain an action for damages against the municipal authorities; but such case is not presented here by either the pleadings or the proof. The whole question has been repeatedly discussed before many tribunals, and the conclusions announced have been arrived at in the great majority of cases. Under the facts disclosed by this record the trees in question, being in front of the residence of appellee and between the public sidewalk and the public highway, in the line of and interfering with the erection of the municipal electric-light plant, the authorities of the town of Hazlehurst were vested with power to authorize the contractor to trim them to any degree that might be found necessary, and, in the absence of any charge of malice, wilful wrong, or oppression, their action in this regard will not be reviewable by the courts. It is evident that the trial judge misinterpreted the prior decisions of this court bearing on the question of municipal control over its highways, and hence committed error in refusing the instruction bearing on this point asked by appellant.

As this is decisive of the case upon its merits, we do not consider or decide the other contention presented.

Reversed and remanded.

Messrs. Denton & Cox, for appellant:

It was not proper to nolle pros. the indictment in Quitman county for the sole purpose of obtaining a change of venue on behalf of the state from Quitman county to Coahoma county.

State v. Pauley, 12 Wis. 538.

After the entering of the nolle prosequi in Quitman county, the defendant cannot be again indicted in any court. To indict him again is to place him twice in jeopardy.

Mr. J. W. Cutrer also for appellant.

Mr. J. N. Flowers for the State.

Truly, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 20th day of October, 1900, in the county of Coahoma, appellant shot his wife, Ella Coleman, under circumstances not necessary to be detailed here, as the decision turns upon another point. On the 21st of October, 1900, in the county of Quitman, said Ella Coleman, as the result of such shot, died. On the 7th of March, 1901, in the county of Quitman, appellant, by the grand jury of that county, was indicted for manslaughter on account of the killing of said Ella Coleman; and as to this indictment, at the September term of the circuit court of said Quitman county, after appellant was arrested, had been arraigned, and pleaded "Not guilty," a nolle prosequi was entered by the district attorney, with consent of the court. On the 25th of November, 1901, appellant was by the grand jury of the county of Coahoma indicted for the murder of said Ella Coleman. The case coming on for trial at the April term of the circuit court of said Coahoma county, appellant demurred to the indictment, and this being overruled, filed a plea in abatement, setting up, among other grounds, the fact that he had once been indicted for said homicide by a court of competent jurisdiction in the county of Quitman, and by such indictment and subsequent proceedings the jurisdiction was vested in the county of Quitman, and that the entering of the nolle prosequi in that county, and the subsequent indictment for the same homicide in the court of another county, was, in effect, to obtain for the state a change of venue, which is not permitted by law, and that this was the real purpose and object of the dismissal of the prosecution in the county of Quitman. The demurrer of the state to this plea was sustained. During the progress of the trial, appellant objected to proof of the death of Ella Coleman as having occurred in the county of Quitman, on the ground that such proof was at variance with the indictment. The indictment in question was in the statutory form, and charged that the murder occurred in the second district of Coahoma county. This objection was by the court overruled, and the trial proceeded, resulting in the conviction of the appellant, and his being sentenced to the penitentiary for life; and from that judgment he appeals, assigning numerous causes of error.

We think the demurrer to the indictment was properly overruled. The indictment was plainly and accurately drawn, and charged explicitly the commission of the offense in the second district of Coahoma county. Code 1892, § 1256.

We are of the opinion that the objection to the testimony in reference to the place of death was properly overruled. This did not constitute a variance between the proof and the indictment. It is true that in Stoughton v. State, 13 Smedes & M. 255, it was held that the party could only be tried for murder in the county where the death happened, but this was on account of the statute as it then existed (Poindexter's Code, chap. 56, p. 314), the terms of which required that the prosecution for the murder should be in the county where the death occurred; but that case has no application here. The cases of Riggs v. State, 26 Miss. 54, and Turner v. State, 28 Miss. 686, were decided while the same statute was in force; and, accordingly, it was held that the indictment must charge that the death occurred in the county where the indictment was preferred. Under the law as it then was, the indictment must have charged, and the evidence must have shown, that the death actually occurred in the county where the indictment was found. The jurisdiction of the court to try the cause was dependent upon the existence and proof of this fact. But this rule has been changed, and the difficulty avoided, by legislation. This is no relaxation of the rule requiring that the facts which constitute the offense charged must be definitely and precisely stated, and that the indictment must contain with certainty every material allegation necessary to show the commission of a complete offense within the jurisdiction of the court in which the indictment is presented. The indictment in the instant case complies with this requirement of the law. The facts constituting the crime charged, its commission within the jurisdiction vested by law in the court, and the nature and cause of the accusation against the defendant, are all averred with certainty and precision.

By § 1335, Code 1892, it is specially provided that where the "fatal blow" is struck in one county, and death occurs in another, the offender may be indicted and tried in either county. Therefore, as, by virtue of the statute, the circuit court of either county is vested with jurisdiction to try the offender, the indictment need only aver the commission of the offense within the jurisdiction of the court where the indictment is found, and it is not essential to charge in the indictment all the attendant circumstances of the homicide. The only reason for the setting out of the venue in the indictment is to show that the court is clothed with jurisdiction over the crime and its prosecution.

Under similar statutes enacted to abrogate or relax the technical rules of criminal pleading in force and adhered to under the common law, the great weight of the more modern, and, in our judgment, sounder-reasoned, authorities, assume the position that it is not necessary to aver more in the indictment than what is sufficient to show the jurisdiction of the trial court, and advise the defendant of the nature and cause of the accusation against him with such certainty as to enable him to plead a conviction or acquittal thereunder in bar of another prosecution for the same offense. So, under our Code provisions, one may be indicted for homicide in either the county where the blow was inflicted, or where the death occurred, and the entire transaction may be averred as having taken place in the county where the indictment is found; and such an indictment will be sustained by proof that either the act was committed, or its effect occurred, in such county. McClain, Crim. Law, § 370; Johnson v. State, 47 Miss. 674; State v. Jones, 38 La. Ann. 792; Territory v. Hicks, 6 N. M. 596, 30 Pac. 872.

The demurrer to the plea in abatement should have been overruled. Section 1334, Code 1892, was designed to meet just such a contingency as arose in the instant case. Under the common law, as construed in the Stoughton Case, before cited, where a homicide was committed partly in one jurisdiction and partly in another, it was doubtful whether the offender could be prosecuted in either; but this is not true as the law now exists. Section 1334 provides that where an offense is committed partly in one county and partly in another, or where the acts, effects, means, or agency occur in whole or in part in different counties, the jurisdiction shall be in either county where the offense was commenced, prosecuted, or consummated, "where prosecution shall be first begun." That provision controls the case at bar. The state can begin its prosecution in any of the counties in which any of the criminal agencies operate,—anywhere that any act is committed in prosecution of the criminal design; but, having chosen the tribunal before which the party accused shall stand trial, it cannot, of its own motion, divest that court of jurisdiction, and begin another prosecution before another court in another jurisdiction. Under the ancient law, under the facts disclosed by this record, the party accused could have been prosecuted in neither jurisdiction. Under existing statutes, he can be prosecuted in either, but it is not the law that he can be prosecuted in both. Therefore, the prosecution in the instant case having been first begun in the circuit court of Quitman county, the estate could not divest that county of its jurisdiction, and rightfully institute another prosecution in a different county. By the terms of the statute, concurrent jurisdiction was vested in the circuit courts of both counties, and the one first attaching becomes exclusive. The trial could not, on the application of the state, have been transferred to any other county, because this is not permitted by law, and the method here adopted is simply an attempt to do by indirection what cannot be done directly. State v. Paulcy, 12 Wis. 538; Ex parte Baldwin, 69 Iowa, 502, 29 N. W. 428; State v. Chinault, 55 Kan. 326, 40 Pac. 662; State v. Brannon, 6 Kan. App. 765, 50 Pac. 986; State v. Wiliford, 91 N. C. 529. That § 1334 applies to the case made by this record is indisputable. Here the act was committed in one county, and the effect produced in another. The crime was wholly completed in neither county, but partly in each. The mere striking of a blow is not murder. Its fatal effect must follow, to make the completed crime. To constitute murder, several essential facts must exist,—among them, the criminal act and its fatal effect,—and these may often occur in different jurisdictions. Com. v. Parker, 2 Pick. 550; State v. Pauley, 12 Wis. 538; Robbins v. State, 8 Ohio St. 131; Aroher v. State, 106 Ind. 426, 7 N. E. 225; Ex parte McNeeley, 36 W. Va. 84, 15 L. R. A. 226, 32 Am. St. Rep. 831, 14 S. E. 436; State v. Jones, 38 La. Ann. 792. Section 1334, providing that in all criminal cases, when the courts of different counties have concurrent jurisdiction, jurisdiction shall vest in the courts of that county “where prosecution shall be first begun,” is simply declaratory of a well-defined and firmly established legal doctrine. It grew out of the comity of nations, and was intended to prevent conflicts between courts of concurrent jurisdiction, whether of the same or different counties or countries, and was found necessary to insure the orderly administration of the criminal laws. But it is more than a mere rule of procedure. It is a substantial and valuable right guaranteed by the law to a party accused of crime. It insures that he shall not twice be placed in jeopardy for the same offense; that he shall be forced to undergo but one trial, and shall not be harassed by repeated indictments in different courts and different jurisdictions. In Ex parte Baldwin, 69 Iowa, 502, 29 N. W. 428, supra,—a case of murder, where the criminal agency was placed in motion in one county, and its fatal effect occurred in another,—the supreme court of Iowa says: “Jurisdiction of the crime for which defendant is indicted rests in either Van Buren or Jefferson county. Code 1892, § 4159. It is plain that the courts of both counties cannot exercise jurisdiction by trials and judgments in the case, for the obvious reason that, if they may, defendant may be subjected to two trials and two punishments for the same offense. How shall it be determined in which county trial and punishment shall be had? The answer is ready and simple, and discloses a rule which, while securing the punishment of criminals, will assure the accused exemption from two trials and double punishment. It is this: The court first obtaining jurisdiction of the person of the accused shall retain it, to the exclusion of the court of the other county, and shall proceed to try the case and administer justice therein. The necessity for the administration of the law in criminal matters without subjecting the accused to the peril of two trials, with the possible result of being twice convicted and punished, demands the recognition of the rule. It is in accord with the familiar rule prevailing everywhere, that, where courts have concurrent jurisdiction, the court whose jurisdiction first attaches must retain the case for final disposition. Authorities need not be cited to support this familiar elementary rule. But few cases are or can be cited announcing the rule, doubtless for the reason that it is rarely, if ever, disputed or doubted.” The fact that in the instant case there is no contest between the courts of the counties of Coahoma and Quitman does not operate to vary the rule, or to deprive the appellant of his right to be proceeded against only by due course of law, and in the jurisdiction where the prosecution was first instituted. Any other rule would be attended with great inconvenience and possible hardship to the party accused of crime, and would create uncertainty and confusion in the administration of the law. The officers of law cannot begin in one county a prosecution for an offense alleged to have been partly committed therein, and then, at their pleasure, dismissing that, commence another prosecution in another county, and so harass the accused by indictment and prosecution in every court vested by law with jurisdiction of the alleged offense. Such was not the intention of the law, and such a practice cannot be countenanced or permitted. The circuit court of Quitman county, having first acquired jurisdiction of the crime with which this appellant stands charged, must maintain it throughout. The entering of the nolle prosequi in that court does not prevent the grand jury of that county, if it so chooses, from now presenting an indictment against appellant, charging him with murder in the slaying of Ella Coleman.

The judgment is reversed, and the indictment and prosecution in Coahoma county quashed and abated.

We do not consider or decide the other assignments, as they may not arise, should there be another trial of this matter.

NEW HAMPSHIRE SUPREME COURT.

ELI F. HEDDING et al.,

v.

Daniel J. GALLAGHER et al.

(.....N. H.....)

Teamsters have no right, either at common law or under a statute requiring railroad companies to furnish facilities for the accommodation of the public, and to furnish to all persons equal terms, facilities, and accommodations for the transportation of persons and property over their roads, and for the use of buildings and grounds in connection with such transportation, to enter upon the railroad property to solicit the privilege of carrying the baggage of passengers; but the railroad company may give such right to one of them, and exclude others from its grounds, if the reasonable requirements of passengers are thereby fully met.

EXCEPTIONS by plaintiffs to a ruling of the Superior Court for Hillsborough County sustaining a demurrer to a bill filed to restrain defendants from soliciting patronage of incoming passengers upon the Boston & Maine Railroad. Sustained.

A demurrer to the original bill in this case was sustained in 69 N. H. 650, 76 Am. St. Rep. 204, 45 Atl. 96, upon the ground that the railroad company had no right to grant exclusive privileges to one teamster; and in 70 N. H. 631, 47 Atl. 614, it was held that it was immaterial that the persons seeking to enjoy the privilege of soliciting the business were setting themselves up as common carriers without legislative authority or agreement with the railroad.

Plaintiff then amended his bill by making the railroad a party plaintiff, and alleging that he had performed the duties required by his contract to the entire satisfaction of the general public; that defendants' entry upon the railroad premises has been an annoyance to the traveling public; that the contract was made for a valuable consideration with the teamster prepared to give the best service; that the service is better performed under the contract than when it is left to indiscriminate competition; that the railroad company cannot furnish room for all persons desiring to solicit patronage upon its grounds; that the railroad had absolute title to the property. A demurrer to the amended bill having been sustained, the case was transferred to the supreme court.

Mr. Oliver E. Branch, for plaintiffs:

The railroad is under no legal obligation or duty, at common law or by statute, to furnish the defendants, who are common carriers of baggage, packages, and parcels, and "who are engaging in another and connecting branch of public service," or other common carriers who may desire to do so, the means and facilities for procuring business and the custom of arriving passengers at the Manchester station. The concession of the right to Hedding to do so for a limited time and under the circumstances disclosed did not create a new and additional public use of the railroad property, or a use which did not exist, and would not have existed, but for such contract or concession.

The railroad holds its property by a title as complete as does an individual, so long as it is engaged in the business of a common carrier. The right to use and enjoy its property is as exclusive and complete as the right of a natural person to use and enjoy his, except in so far as it is limited and qualified by those public uses to which it is devoted or subjected by statute or common law; and in the discharge of the duties incident to those uses its rights are absolute and exclusive.

New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. v. Scovill, 71 Conn. 136, 42 L. R. A. 157, 71 Am. St. Rep. 159, 41 Atl. 246.

Defendants are not seeking for "equal terms, facilities, and accommodations for the transportation" of themselves or their property, and the general public, including defendants, has no right to the use of railroad property except for such purposes. Those rights are not denied them, or impaired, until the use of the railroad property, for the purposes of transportation, is denied them, or furnished them unequally.

The contract of carriage between a passenger and a common carrier, and the relation of carrier and passenger, terminate when the passenger has alighted from the train, and has left the place where passengers are discharged, within a reasonable time.

The passenger cannot, as of right, demand of the carrier the privilege of bringing his own private conveyance onto the railroad land to take him to his destination, since, if it chooses to do so, the carrier may enclose its premises.

No one can complain of discrimination, except those who are entitled as of right to equality of treatment.

Unless all persons who wish to engage in the business of carrying baggage or passengers from the Manchester station have a right to go upon the railroad property for the purpose of obtaining or securing that kind of business, no one can complain if the privilege is denied him, or allege discrimination because he is refused the privilege, while another is accorded it. Regulation often, of necessity, involves lawful discrimination. The regulations which a railroad company can make for the conduct of its business are always such as conserve the comfort and convenience of the public which employs its services as a common carrier; and in furnishing the services which it is under a legal duty to furnish, it cannot discriminate between those to whom they are furnished.

Mr. J. A. Broderick, for defendants:

The contract sought to be approved and enforced here is against public policy, and one that a court of equity cannot support. In determining the status of a contract void because against public policy, the court has to consider, not the good that has or will result, but the evil that may. Though the immediate effect is beneficial, if, as a matter of law, its tendency be injurious, it is void. By the term "public policy" is understood "that principal of law which holds that no one can lawfully do that which has a tendency to be injurious to the public, or against public good."

Regulation is not discrimination, and a contract which so far discriminates that the avored party pays a substantial sum for the privilege cannot be considered a regulation in any fair sense of the term.

Walsh, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Boston & Maine Railroad, having been joined as a plaintiff by amendment, claims that, by virtue of its ownership of the station at Manchester, subject to the rights of the public to use it for the purposes of transportation, it is entitled to exclude the defendants therefrom, who come there merely for the purpose of soliciting from its passengers the carriage of their baggage to points within the city of Manchester. The defendants contend that, whatever the railroad's rights of ownership may be, it cannot deny them the privilege of entering the station grounds and building for the prosecution of their business, because it has expressly granted that privilege to Hedding; that it has no right to authorize or employ one job teamster to solicit the carriage of baggage in its station and to exclude all other job teamsters from its grounds; in short, that it cannot discriminate between carriers of that class, who seek the opportunity of soliciting from passengers alighting from the cars the privilege of transporting their trunks and parcels from the station to other parts of the city. It is not claimed in behalf of the defendants that they have any legislative or contractual right to occupy the station and its approaches, but the right is said to arise from the discriminating feature of the railroad's contract with Hedding.

In reply to this position, the railroad argues that, if the alleged discrimination against the defendants did not violate any of their antecedent and subsisting rights with reference to their occupation of the station, the discrimination was not illegal, and the contract with Hedding is immaterial, so far as its right to prosecute this suit is concerned; that the fundamental question relates to the rights of job teamsters to solicit business on the premises of the railroad after notice to desist; that, if they had that right, the contract with Hedding did not deprive them of it, and they could not be enjoined from exercising it, and, if they did not have it, the contract did not give it to them, because the discrimination was not illegal as against them.

Upon this summary of the respective contentions of the parties, the question is presented whether truckmen have at common law or by statute the right to enter upon and occupy a railway terminal station for the purpose of soliciting business. If they have that right, the railroad cannot exclude all, or all but one of them, from its station; if they do not have it, the further question arises whether they can acquire it under, or because of, a special license granted to one of their number. The last question has been answered in the affirmative upon a former transfer of this case, before the railroad became a party (69 N. H. 650, 76 Am. St. Rep. 204, 45 Atl. 96), and while the present plaintiffs may not be entitled, as a matter of right, to a rehearing of the question, and while the railroad, though made a party plaintiff, according to a more or less uniform practice might be bound by the former decision (Amoskeag Mfg. Co. v. Head, 59 N. H. 332, 337; Weare v. Deering, 60 N. H. 56), the importance of the controverted points and of a correct ascertainment of the respective rights of the parties after prolonged litigation seem to justify, if they do not require, a further consideration of the case upon its present transfer. And while little, if any, doubt could be entertained that the demurrer should be overruled upon the allegations of the recent amendment of the bill, to the effect that the presence of the defendants in the station obstructs and interferes with the public business of transportation, the practical value of such a decision would be so small that, in view of the fact that the case has been pending for a long time, and has been argued by counsel upon the broader and more fundamental question of the legal rights of the parties, both under the contract and independent of the contract, it is deemed expedient to base the decision upon a consideration of the latter question. "It shall be the duty of the proprietors of every railroad to provide suitable crossings, stations, and other facilities for the accommodation of the public." Pub. Stat. 1901, chap. 159, § 1. "The proprietors of every railroad shall furnish to all persons reasonable and equal terms, facilities, and accommodations for the transportation of persons and property over their railroad, and for the use of depots, buildings, and grounds in connection with such transportation, and for the interchange of such traffic at points of connection with other railroads." Id. chap. 160, § 1. The corporate duties thus declared by the legislature, and subject to which the corporation holds its real estate, it owes to the public having occasion to employ its facilities for the transportation of themselves or their property. It is obliged to provide reasonable accommodations at its station in Manchester for the use of the traveling public who are brought together at that point. But it owes this public duty, not to all persons indiscriminately, but to those only who stand in some contractual relation with it as passengers. A trespasser in its station could not complain that it did not furnish suitable and reasonable means for the accommodation of its patrons, for to him it does not owe the duty of furnishing facilities for transportation. Harris v. Stevens, 31 Vt. 79, 73 Am. Dec. 337. If it is conceded that it is the duty of the railroad to furnish arriving passengers with reasonable means and opportunities for removing their baggage from the station, and that such means and opportunities include the presence at the station of soliciting agents for the carriage of baggage, it would not follow that it owed the defendants the duty of affording them adequate facilities for the solicitation of business from the passengers. It cannot be assumed that the passengers' convenience under their contract of carriage over the railroad requires the presence of the defendants as independent carriers at the station on the arrival of trains. The railroad may furnish or permit adequate means for the convenience of its passengers in this respect, without the voluntary assistance of the defendants. If it is its duty to have men present on the arrival of its trains, ready, when requested, to remove the baggage of passengers from its premises, no substantial reason is suggested why it may not perform that duty through such agents as it sees fit to employ, or why it should be obliged to submit to the irresponsible interference of unemployed third parties in doing the work required of it.

Nor is it apparent how the railroad's duty to its passengers in this respect gives rise to a right in all local job teamsters to perform that duty, or any part of it. The right of its passengers to have men present to solicit the carriage of baggage, or to receive such solicitation from them upon the arrival of trains, if it exists at all, does not require the presence of independent local truckmen. Whether the soliciting agents are independent local truckmen, or whether they are men specially permitted by the railroad to perform that service in its station, is an unimportant detail in the reasonable performance of the public duty to passengers of providing adequate facilities for the transfer of baggage. "So long as the public are served to their reasonable satisfaction, it is a matter of no importance who serves them." Express Cases, 117 U. S. 1, 24, 29 L. ed. 791, 801, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 542, 628; Chicago, St. L. & N. O. R. Co. v. Pullman Southern Car Co. 139 U. S. 79, 89, 35 L. ed. 97, 101, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 490. Hence the railroad's duty to its passengers does not include a duty or obligation to permit all local carriers of baggage to solicit business in its station. The right claimed by the defendants to enter and remain upon the station grounds cannot be established by that method of reasoning.

Nor do the defendants, if regarded as common carriers, owe a duty to the incoming passengers to meet them in the station and solicit their patronage. Hence it follows that when they do enter the station and solicit business they are acting in a private capacity, and not in the performance of any public duty, either to the passengers, the railroad, or anyone else. If they are common carriers when driving about the streets, they are not common carriers performing a public duty when they enter the station to solicit the carriage of baggage. Probably solicitation is no part of a common carrier's business anywhere; nor is it a part of the public duty of a local job teamster to be at any particular place to receive parcels for carriage. Hence no duty, in the absence of contract, rests upon the defendants to be present at the station on the arrival of trains. As public policy does not require their presence there, and as the obligation of the railroad to the public can be performed as well, and perhaps better, when they are not present, no substantial reason remains for the claim that the railroad is bound to furnish job teamsters facilities for carrying on their business in its stations. To say that when the ordinary job teamster happens to go into a railroad station and to ask a passenger for the privilege of carrying his trunk to the hotel, he is in the performance of an important public function as a common carrier of baggage, or that the railroad is under an imperative obligation to the public, the passenger, or the teamster to permit such solicitation in its station, is the assertion of a principle founded upon the radically erroneous assumption that the property of a railroad may be used by others without compensation, and against the protest of the corporation, for the prosecution of their private business.

But it is said that the defendants, being common carriers of baggage in Manchester, are entitled to enter the railroad station to solicit business, because the railroad has set apart or devoted that real estate to the business of the transfer of baggage to other connecting lines of public travel. But this right, if it exists, is not an original right vested in the defendants by any act of the legislature or by the common law. The legislature has not required railroad corporations to furnish all common carriers of baggage who happen to approach one of its terminal stations with the means of most conveniently and expeditiously obtaining contracts from its passengers for the carriage of their parcels. The right to the reasonable use of the terminal facilities of one railroad by a connecting railroad does not exist except by legislative grant or by contract. Without such permission, one corporation cannot enter upon and use the land of another. "Every railroad corporation shall, at reasonable times and for reasonable compensation, draw over its railroad the cars, passengers, and freight delivered to it by any other corporation whose railroad connects with its railroad, and which is authorized to enter on and use the same, or which is authorized to use the railroad of any corporation having such authority, and the cars, passengers, and freight destined for such connecting railroad; and it shall provide convenient and suitable depot accommodations for such passengers and freight." Pub. Stat. 1901, chap. 157, § 10. Special legislative provisions upon this subject have been deemed necessary in substantially all railroad charters granted in this state, which, recognizing the right of private ownership of railroad property, establish an equitable basis of compensation for the imposed use. "The common-law obligations of a railroad company to a connecting line are the same, as to reception, transportation, and delivery of freight, as those existing between the railroad company and an individual shipper. Whatever rights or privileges other than those belonging to a natural person, that are claimed by one railroad company against a connecting company, must be found either in the charters of the companies, or arise from contract." Shelbyville R. Co. v. Louisville, C. & L. R. Co. 82 Ky. 541, 545; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Denver & N. O. R. Co. 110 U. S. 667, 28 L. ed. 291, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 185; Concord & M. R. Co. v. Boston & M. R. Co. 68 N. H. 519, 39 Atl. 1073.

Having no express authority for the use they make of the railroad's station, the defendants had no right to such use before the contract with Hedding, in the absence of a revocable license, unless it can be based upon or derived from the right of passengers to reasonable accommodations for the removal of their baggage from the station. But, if that duty is fully and satisfactorily performed by the railroad,—if its patrons receive reasonable, prompt, and adequate service,—the presence of the defendants at the point where they alight from the cars is unnecessary, and may be objectionable. If it is the public duty of the railroad to afford adequate facilities for the transfer and removal of baggage, and if that duty is performed to the satisfaction of its patrons, it is difficult to understand how local truckmen acquired the right, or how a duty rests upon them, to be present for the performance of that service, except so far as they have been permitted by the railroad to enter its premises; that is, except so far as the right exists under a revocable license from the railroad.

When it is said that the station has been devoted to the business of the transfer of baggage, so that all truckmen have an absolute right to prosecute their business at that point, the error in the argument is that it disregards the duty of the railroad to the traveling public, to whose convenience it has devoted its station, and assumes that its license to truckmen to assemble there has become irrevocable. But it is elementary that a mere license to enter upon land is not by lapse of time changed into an absolute right of entry. "If it be insisted that by opening the doors of their depots the company give an implied license to any and all persons to enter, it may be answered that by thus opening their doors they do prima facie give an implied license to all persons to enter, and no person is a trespasser by merely entering therein. But all such licenses are in their nature revocable, and if actually revoked, and due notice given to an individual or class of individuals, and they still persist in entering, it is without a license, and the owner has a right to exclude them by force, if necessary, using no more force than is necessary for that purpose." Com. v. Power, 7 Met. 596, 602, 41 Am. Dec. 465; Harris v. Stevens, 31 Vt. 79, 73 Am. Dec. 337. And it can make no difference that in this case the defendants are styled common carriers, for, unless the convenience of the traveling public requires their presence in the railroad's station, they are in the same legal position with reference to the railroad that a private individual occupies under the same circumstances. It is not intended to decide that it is not the legal duty of the railroad to permit local truckmen to occupy its station for the purpose of soliciting business from its passengers when the convenience of the latter may require the presence of the former; but it is sufficient for the purposes of the present argument to hold that, when the traveling public are reasonably and satisfactorily served in the matter of the transfer of their baggage, there is no occasion for the presence of an additional force of men who are ready for hire to serve the public as common carriers of parcels. If there is no occasion for such additional service, the teamster's right to render it on the railroad's premises cannot be derived from the railroad's general duty to its passengers. The conclusion seems to be inevitable on principle that any right the defendants had, before the contract with Hedding, to enter the station at Manchester in pursuit of employment, in the absence of any public necessity therefor, was derived from a revocable license granted by the railroad as the owner of the real estate used for the purposes of a station, and that on the revocation of the license the defendants' right ceased.

It is to be noted that it is alleged in the bill that Hedding, in his permissive use of the railroad's property, fully meets the convenience of incoming passengers with reference to the removal of their baggage. This is equivalent to saying that the traveling public have no reasonable ground for complaint that the railroad has not provided or does not permit all such facilities for transportation as its duty to the public requires. If a passenger desires his baggage carried to his home or to a particular hotel, or to any other place in Manchester, Hedding, by an arrangement with the railroad, is present with the necessary teams and men to promptly and carefully perform the service for a reasonable compensation. If the service is satisfactorily performed, it is immaterial to the passenger who does it, unless he sees fit to employ his own servant or agent. But if Hedding should solicit the carriage of baggage to one hotel alone, when there were several, it might consistently be held that the railroad did not furnish or permit such reasonable, full, and adequate facilities for transportation at its terminal as the convenience of its patrons demanded. It is not difficult to suggest supposable cases of monopolistic interference with the reasonable rights and expectations of passengers upon their arrival at a railroad station, resulting from the exclusion therefrom of all but one particular truckman or cabman. Such inconvenience suffered by passengers might have a strong tendency to prove that the traveling public were not properly served, in consequence of the discriminating license granted to a single individual. But no progress is made in the discussion of this case by the multiplication of instances of apparent injustice to passengers that might follow from the grant of exclusive privileges in a railway station, because the fact is admitted by the demurrer that Hedding fully meets all the reasonable requirements of incoming passengers in the removal of their baggage, in accordance with the express terms of his agreement. The railroad requires him to accommodate the public in all respects within the sphere of his business at the station, not to infringe upon the rights of its patrons and inconvenience them in obtaining reasonable accommodations. Whether, upon a trial, this fact can be proved, and what evidence would be competent, sufficient, or conclusive upon that issue, are questions which may arise hereafter, but which are not now pertinent.

But it is said that the defendants' right of entry and occupation arose when the railroad attempted to grant the exclusive privilege to Hedding to solicit business in its station. It is admitted that for many purposes the railroad has the same rights of ownership in its station building that private persons have in their real estate; but it is asserted that "a common carrier, who owes the duty to furnish to passengers for Manchester reasonable and equal facilities at the station there, is bound to accord equal facilities to all who come to that station for the purpose of carrying passengers or baggage beyond its line of road. The rights of the traveling public being involved, all that the road can do is to make reasonable regulations as to how these rights shall be furthered by baggage-carriers. It cannot discriminate between them." Hedding v. Gallagher, 89 N. H. 650, 661, 76 Am. St. Rep. 204, 45 Atl. 96. It is not apparent how the duty of the railroad to furnish equal and reasonable facilities to its passengers for the removal of baggage originates a duty on its part to local truckmen to permit them indiscriminately to occupy its station for the solicitation of the carriage of baggage. The equality of service which the law requires is an equality between persons having contractual relations with the railroad relating to transportation, and, if it furnishes the traveling public that equality in a reasonable and satisfactory manner, it is difficult to understand upon what principle its employment of one set of men to serve its patrons equally and properly gives rise to a right in another set of men to occupy its station for the performance of the same service. If the defendants had no absolute right to occupy the station before the discriminating contract was made, if the traveling public had no right to demand that they should be allowed that privilege, and if, as is admitted by the demurrer, Hedding, under the contract, furnishes adequate and reasonable facilities to the traveling public for the removal of their baggage, it would seem that the defendants' claim could only be justified by express legislation, which does not exist. The discriminating character of the contract deprived them of no essential right they possessed before, and it did not deprive the traveling public of that reasonable and equal service to which they are entitled.

Whether the contract is illegal, upon grounds of public policy, depends upon the question whether the discrimination is unreasonable as against the traveling public. Pub. Stat. 1901, chap. 160, §§ 1-3; McDuffee v. Portland & R. R. Co. 52 N. H. 430, 451, 13 Am. Rep. 72; State v. Concord R. Co. 59 N. H. 85; Concord & P. R. Co. v. Forsaith, 59 N. H. 122, 47 Am. Rep. 181. All discriminating contracts are not illegal. Indeed, it would probably be difficult to draw a contract that might not, in some sense, be said to be discriminating. When A employs B to work for him, he discriminates against C, whom he has refused to employ; but, as none of C's legal rights are infringed by the employment of B, the discrimination is valid. It is only when the discriminating contract is intended to deprive others or the public of legal rights that it is illegal. Discrimination between two parties, neither of whom has a right founded upon a public duty of the principal, is as permissible to a railroad as to an individual, and is one of the essential and inherent characteristics of the ownership of property. A railroad corporation holds its property with the same rights of proprietorship that an individual does, subject, however, to certain public uses. It has, by virtue of its ownership, the individual's right of discrimination in the enjoyment of its property, except so far as the claimed right is consistent with, or prejudicial to, the public right of user. If by a private contract it gives one an exclusive privilege, the question is, Does the discrimination interfere with or curtail a public right, or is it violative of any corporate duty to the public who seek to use the railroad as a means of transportation? If it has that effect, it is in that respect unenforceable; otherwise it is legal.

If this incident of ownership is exercised to the prejudice of the rights of the traveling public, as by providing inadequate or otherwise unsatisfactory service, or by demanding unreasonable rates for the service, the law furnishes a substantial remedy. But it is unnecessary in this case to define the limits of such remedial power, since the rights of the traveling public have not been abridged or infringed. In view of the conceded fact that under the contract the traveling public has received adequate and reasonable service, and that the discrimination complained of promotes the convenience of arriving passengers, the rights of nobody are infringed, and the discrimination is legal. Manchester & L. R. Co. v. Concord R. Corp. 66 N. H. 100, 127, 9 L. R. A. 689, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 319, 49 Am. St. Rep. 582, 20 Atl. 383.

It is argued, however, that, because it is provided in the contract that Hedding shall pay the railroad $100 a year for the exclusive privilege of soliciting the carriage of baggage in the station, a monopoly is thus established which might operate to the disadvantage of passengers, by increasing the rates they are obliged to pay for the service 64 L. R. A.

rendered. To this argument it is a sufficient answer to say (1) that the case discloses no facts from which it logically follows that the rates are increased; and (2) the contract expressly provides that they shall be reasonable,—that is, for reasonable service, reasonable rates only shall be exacted; and this provision of the contract has been fully observed. "While, without doubt, contracts which have a direct tendency to prevent a healthy competition are detrimental to the public, and consequently against public policy, it is equally free from doubt that when such contracts prevent an unhealthy competition, and yet furnish the public with adequate facilities at fixed and reasonable rates, they are beneficial and in accord with sound principles of public policy." Manchester & L. R. Co. v. Concord R. Corp. 66 N. H. 100, 127, 9 L. R. A. 689, 693, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 319, 323, 49 Am. St. Rep. 582, 20 Atl. 383.

"It is the unreasonable and injurious character of the act that is made unlawful." State v. Concord R. Co. 59 N. H. 85, 87.

The right of patrons of the road to employ servants to go upon the grounds of the railroad, either to carry their baggage to, or remove it from, the station, cannot be denied, in view of the public duty of the railroad to its passengers; but it is fallacious to argue from this admitted legal principle that unemployed teamsters have an equal right to enter the station for the purpose of seeking employment. The implied right of a passenger under his contract of carriage to employ a servant or agent to carry his trunk to the baggage room, and to meet him at the station to receive his baggage on his return, is not, it would seem, analogous to the supposed right of an unemployed individual to enter the station for the purpose of seeking employment as a baggage expressman. The latter cannot justify his entry under any contractual relation with the railroad entered into by himself, or under a contract of agency of employment by any passenger arriving at the station. He is not employed by anyone to be at the station. He has not agreed to be there. He is there, not in the performance of any contractual duty, but in the pursuit of an opportunity to make a contract. Among the reasonable conveniences the railroad is bound to accord to its passengers is the removal of their baggage when delivered to them within the station by such agents as they may employ. Tobin v. Portland, S. & P. R. Co. 59 Me. 183, 8 Am. Rep. 415. But this evidently does not include the duty to permit strangers to solicit in its station contracts of employment from its passengers. The duty of the corporation to its passengers in 52 this respect does not establish the right claimed in third parties.

In a specific instance, the question is whether A, who is not employed by the railroad or by any of its patrons, and who is not seeking to use the means furnished by the railroad for the transportation of himself or his property, has the same right to occupy the station grounds that B has, who is especially permitted by the railroad to be there for the accommodation of the passengers, and fully meets all their wants in respect to their baggage. If the public are fully accommodated, what consideration of public policy or what principle of law gives rise to a right in A to occupy the property of the railroad? B is not there in the capacity of a patron of the road, and A does not claim to justify his presence as a patron of the road. As it is clear that the road does not owe the duty of furnishing equal facilities for transportation to people who are not seeking to avail themselves of such facilities, it follows that neither A nor B, when seeking employment,—not transportation,—can base his right upon the principle of equality. To recognize such a right would lead to most absurd results. B is there as a licensee of the road for the benefit of its patrons, and incidentally for the benefit of the road itself and his own advantage, while A is present, not by virtue of any license or authority from the road or its patrons, but in a purely private capacity, and for his own benefit alone.

If it is assumed that the defendants are in a legal sense common carriers of parcels in Manchester, as they are alleged to be in the bill, and that consequently they are under certain obligations to the public, the conclusion does not follow that they have an independent right, as carriers, to appropriate the property of the railroad for the purpose of serving the traveling public, who already receive ample service from other agencies. They cannot justify their entry upon the railroad's grounds by proving that it occasions no inconvenience to the passengers or the employees of the railroad, for the corporation does not hold its property subject to the use of other and connecting common carriers, when the public are fully served without such use. Whether, under such circumstances, it would be reasonable, if they had a right to be present, and whether that burden ought to be imposed upon the railroad, are questions of the legislative control of corporations, upon which the lawmaking body has not seen fit to take action. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Denver & N. O. R. Co. 110 U. S. 667, 682, 28 L. ed. 291, 297, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 185. The railroad is under no statutory or common-law obligation, as the owner of its station, to gratuitously permit other unemployed common carriers to use it as a place for soliciting business, merely because such use might seem to others to be reasonable. The doctrine of reasonableness in the owner's use of his property (Franklin v. Durgee, 71 N. H. 186, 58 L. R. A. 112, 51 Atl. 911; Horan v. Byrnes [N. H.] 62 L. R. A. 602, 54 Atl. 945) has not gone to the extent of holding that he must suffer such occupation of his premises by others as is not inconvenient to him and does not interfere with his practical enjoyment thereof.

Nor is the suggestion sound, that, because a truckman who is specially employed by a passenger to transport his trunk has a right to enter the station for that purpose, all common carriers seeking the carriage of trunks have a similar right of entry, derived from the public whom they are desirous of serving. In the former case the truckman represents the passenger, and is his servant or agent when he occupies the station, while in the latter case the carriers of trunks do not represent, and are not the servants or agents of, the traveling public before their employment, but are merely private individuals from whom a traveler may require transportation service; and, until such service is required, they have no duties to perform to the public, and are invested with no rights as against the railroad.

The case of Markham v. Brown, 8 N. H. 523, 31 Am. Dec. 209, is claimed to be an authority for the defendants' contention. There the question related to the right of a stage driver to enter the plaintiff's inn to solicit business from travelers who while there were guests. This was a right, as Judge Parker says, "derived from the right of the traveler" while a guest in the inn. The right of a guest to receive callers while being entertained in a hotel is quite different from the right of a passenger, when alighting from a train, to be importuned by a crowd of unnecessary job teamsters. The hotel is the guest's temporary resting place or home, where he has to some extent the same right to receive callers seeking business relations with him, who conduct themselves with propriety, as he has to receive them at his permanent home; and this right of the guest includes or gives rise to the right of others to visit him while in the hotel. But because this is so, it by no means follows that every job teamster has a right, derived from the general transportation right of passengers, to meet them at the station for the purpose of soliciting the carriage of their trunks. See Old Colony R. Co. v. Tripp, 147 Mass. 35, 37, 38, 9 Am. St. Rep. 661, 17 N. E. 89. A further distinction is permissible between that case and this one, in that it did not appear that the convenience and comfort of the guests in the hotel would be promoted by the exclusion of all stage drivers but one, or that the duties of the innkeeper to his guests required such a regulation. Neither the private interests of the landlord nor the comfort of his guests would suffer by the temporary presence of stagecoach drivers in the inn, and a regulation excluding them from the inn might be unreasonable. This distinction is suggested in State v. Steele, 106 N. C. 766, 8 L. R. A. 516, 19 Am. St. Rep. 573, 11 S. E. 478. It was there held that where an innkeeper made a regulation that "no liveryman or agent of any transportation or baggage company . . . will be allowed in the hotel," and gave notice to the agent of a livery stable, who had been in the habit of soliciting custom at his hotel, not to come upon the hotel premises again, the innkeeper had a right to expel him without using unnecessary force, if he entered the hotel after such notice and engaged in soliciting custom, although at the time the hotel keeper had made an arrangement with another keeper of a livery stable, by which the former should receive 10 per cent of the proceeds of the business derived from the guests of the hotel. Referring to Markham v. Brown, the court says (p. 785, 106 N. C. p. 523, 8 L. R. A., p. 582, 19 Am. St. Rep., and p. 485, 11 S. E.): "There was no evidence in Markham v. Brown that the proprietor of the hotel had any contract with another stage line, or would suffer pecuniary loss or injury if the agent who was expelled were successful in his solicitations; and it seems that Angell and others, who cite as authority that case, as well as Jencks v. Coleman, 2 Sumn. 221 [Fed. Cas. No. 7,258, and Barney v. Oyster Bay & H. S. B. Co. 67 N. Y. 301, 23 Am. Rep. 115], reconcile them by drawing the distinction that in the latter cases . . . the person whose expulsion was justified was doing an injury to the proprietor who had him removed, by diminishing his profits derived legitimately from a business used as an adjunct to that of common carrier or innkeeper." Other distinctions between the legal rights and duties of innkeepers and the proprietors of railroad stations, material to the present inquiry, have been urged in argument; but those above suggested are sufficient to show that Markham v. Brown is not an authority of much weight in this case, and that its citation is misleading.

An examination of other cases cited in support of the defendants' claim shows that they are not directly in point, and therefore can have little weight as authorities in this case. Kalamazoo Hack & Bus Co. v. Sootsma, 84 Mich. 194, 10 L. R. A. 819, 22 Am. 64 L. R. A.

St. Rep. 693, 47 N. W. 367, holds that a railroad company cannot give to one hack company the right to the use and occupancy of a portion of its station grounds, to the exclusion of others engaged in the like business of the carriage of passengers to and from its station. Little, if any, further information is derived from a reading of the opinion. It does not seem to be based upon an accurate understanding of what is meant by the railroad's duty to treat all alike. It apparently assumes that the railroad owes a duty to hackmen to allow them to occupy its premises, independent of its duty to passengers. Moreover, it did not appear that the exclusive privilege granted was for the convenience of passengers, and the case only decides that the railroad "cannot arbitrarily admit one common carrier of passengers or freight to its depots or grounds, and exclude all others, for no other reason than that it is for its own profit or pleasure." But it would seem that, if the discrimination had been for the benefit of the passengers, as it is in this case, the court would have reached an opposite result. In the subsequent case of Cole v. Roucem, 88 Mich. 219, 13 L. R. A. 848, 50 N. W. 138, it was held that a rule excluding certain hackmen from stands assigned to others, which was made to promote the public convenience, was reasonable and enforceable. Indianapolis Union R. Co. v. Dohn, 153 Ind. 10, 45 L. R. A. 427, 74 Am. St. Rep. 274, 53 N. E. 937, is perhaps more unsatisfactory in its reasoning than Kalamazoo Hack & Bus Co. v. Sootsma, and is open to the same criticism.

Oravens v. Rodgers, 101 Mo. 247, 14 S. W. 106, contains no discussion of the rights and duties of railroads and hackmen; nor did it appear that the public were fully accommodated under the discriminating contract. The decision is the result of an assumption that passengers receive the best service when there is no discrimination with reference to the presence of hackmen.

In Montana Union R. Co. v. Langlois, 9 Mont. 419, 8 L. R. A. 753, 18 Am. St. Rep. 745, 24 Pac. 209, the court (p. 429, 9 Mont., p. 757, 8 L. R. A., p. 750, 18 Am. St. Rep., and p. 211, 24 Pac.) define the subject-matter of the suit as "the grant of a special privilege to Lavell Brothers to use the specified portion of plaintiff's platform at said station, and the exclusion of all others from approaching thereto to land or receive passengers." "If," the court continue, in stating the plaintiff's position, a passenger "contracts with another than Lavell Brothers . . . to bring him there and be there to receive him on his return, he must alight from his carriage or be received by it 50 feet away from said platform." In other words, the discrimination authorized by the contract in that case was a discrimination affecting the comfort and convenience of passengers, and it was held to be a violation of the plaintiff's public duty to treat all passengers with substantial uniformity. McConnell v. Pedigo, 92 Ky. 465, 18 S. W. 15, is explainable upon the same ground.

The cases of New England Exp. Co. v. Maine O. R. Co. 57 Me. 188, 2 Am. Rep. 31, and McDuffee v. Portland & R. R. Co. 52 N. H. 430, 13 Am. Rep. 72, relate to discriminating contracts affecting rival express companies. The question determined in those cases was entirely different from the one presented here. The express companies were regarded as individuals who were seeking contractual relations with the railroads for the carriage of parcels. They were not attempting to use the property of the railroad for their own purposes, independent of a contract for the carriage of themselves and their property. The question whether express companies are to be treated as individuals having property for carriage, and so entitled to demand the services of railroads as common carriers, or whether they are merely agencies by which the public may be served, and so not entitled to railroad accommodations when the railroad provides other adequate means for the same service (Express Cases, 117 U. S. 1, 29 L. ed. 791, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 542, 628), does not require discussion at this time. It is sufficient for present purposes that these cases do not sustain the proposition that, if the railroad allows one man to do a private business in its station, it must not exclude others who desire the same privilege. On the contrary, they authorize the statement that the railroad's public duty of equal treatment relates only to persons or corporations having business relations with it in the matter of railroad transportation, and not to strangers in the prosecution of their private affairs. General or broad statements of the public duty of common carriers to avoid discrimination in their service of the public are necessarily limited or qualified by the special facts of the case in view of which they are made. Serious misapprehension of the scope and effect of a judicial opinion is often likely to occur if the exact point in issue is disregarded.

On the other hand, there are numerous cases holding that a railroad may give to one hackman or one truckman the exclusive privilege to come upon its grounds for the purpose of soliciting business from passengers arriving upon its trains, provided the service thus afforded is adequate and reasonable. In Old Colony R. Co. v. Tripp, 147 Mass. 35, 37, 9 Am. St. Rep. 661, 662, 17 N. E. 89, 92, in sustaining the plaintiff's 64 L. R. A.

claim, the court says: "The defendant was allowed to use the depot for any business that he had with the plaintiff. But he had no business to transact with the plaintiff. He had no merchandise or baggage to deliver to the plaintiff, or to receive from it. His purpose was to use the depot as a place for soliciting contracts with incoming passengers for the transportation of their baggage. The railroad company may be under obligation to the passenger to see that he has reasonable facilities for procuring transportation for himself and his baggage from the station where his transit ends. What conveniences shall be furnished to passengers within the station for that purpose is a matter wholly between them and the company. The defendant is a stranger both to the plaintiff and to its passengers, and can claim no rights against the plaintiff to the use of its station, either in his own right or in the right of passengers. The fact that he is willing to assume relations with any passenger which will give him relations with the plaintiff, involving the right to use the depot, does not establish such relations or such right; and the right of passengers to be solicited by drivers of hacks and job wagons is not such as to give to all such drivers a right to occupy the platforms and depots of railroads." The court considers the claim, which is urged in this case, that the railroad, having given the right or privilege to one hackman to occupy its platform, could not refuse to allow other hackmen to exercise the same right or privilege, and dispose of it, in this language (p. 38, 147 Mass., p. 664, 9 Am. St. Rep., p. 93, 17 N. E.): "The statute, in providing that a railroad corporation shall give to all persons equal facilities for the use of its depots, obviously means a use of right. It does not intend to prescribe who shall have the use of the depot, but to provide that all who have the right to use it shall be furnished by the railroad company with equal conveniences. The statute applies only to relations between railroads, as common carriers, and their patrons. It does not enact that a license given by a railroad company to a stranger shall be a license to all the world. . . . The fact that the defendant, as the owner of a job wagon, is a common carrier, gives him no special right under the statute; it only shows that it is possible for him to perform for passengers the service which he wishes to solicit of them." If the fact that three of the seven judges sitting in the case dissented, weakened the authority of the decision, that criticism is not now important, since the opinion and ruling of the court have been approved and followed in at least two other cases arising in that jurisdiction. Boston

& A. R. Co. v. Brown, 177 Mass. 65, 52 L. R. A. 418, 58 N. E. 189, and Boston & M. R. Co. v. Sullivan, 177 Mass. 230, 83 Am. St. Rep. 275, 58 N. E. 689, make it certain that the law of Massachusetts upon this subject is not doubtful or obscure. Corporate duty to one class of persons for one purpose is not there converted, by a resort to general and inexact expressions of equality, into corporate duty to another class of persons for another purpose.

In Griswold v. Webb, 16 R. I. 649, 7 L. R. A. 302, 19 Atl. 143, it was held that a common carrier owning or controlling its terminals may exclude from them persons soliciting trade, or hacking, or expressing, without its license, but that it cannot deprive a passenger of the privilege of being carried from the terminus in a convenient and usual way, nor can it compel a passenger to take certain carriages or none. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. v. Bork, 23 R. I. 218, 49 Atl. 965, was an action of trespass by the railroad against a hackman claiming a right to occupy its premises, based upon its exclusive permission to such occupancy given to another hackman. The court, following the decision in Griswold v. Webb, says (p. 222, 23 R. I., and p. 966, 49 Atl.): "If the act of the defendant was such as he rightly might perform, then the exclusive grant to another is of no effect as to this defendant. If the act of the defendant was not within his legal right, it can avail him nothing that another has been permitted to do for a consideration that which has been denied as of right to him." The special discriminating contract was held to be immaterial in that case.

In New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. v. Scovill, 71 Conn. 136, 42 L. R. A. 157, 71 Am. St. Rep. 159, 41 Atl. 246, it was held that a railroad company's grant of the exclusive privilege of soliciting business on the depot grounds at a station, and of "plying" the business of a carrier of passengers or luggage, and forbidding others to do such acts on the grounds, if not inconsistent with the reasonable accommodation of passengers, is a reasonable provision, such as the road, in the exercise of its right of ownership, has the right to make.

In New York a statute provides that "no preference for the transaction of the business of a common carrier upon its cars, or in its depots or buildings, or upon its grounds, shall be granted by any railroad corporation to any one of two or more persons, associations, or corporations competing in the same business, or in the business of transporting property for themselves or others." In New York C. & H. R. R. Co. v. Flynn, 74 Hun, 124, 26 N. Y. Supp. 859, it was held that this statute does not give all the hackmen of a city the absolute right to intrude upon, or make a stand of, the premises of a railroad corporation for the purpose of soliciting business; nor does it prevent a railroad corporation, which by contract has conferred upon a transfer company the exclusive privilege of going upon its premises with hacks for the purpose of soliciting passengers, from prohibiting other hackmen, who have no contract relations with the railroad corporations or its passengers, from doing so. This ruling was adopted in Brown v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 75 Hun, 355, 27 N. Y. Supp. 69, and that case was affirmed by the court of appeals in 151 N. Y. 674, 46 N. E. 1145. The same question arose in New York C. & H. R. R. Co. v. Sheeley, 57 N. Y. S. R. 766, 27 N. Y. Supp. 185, and the same result was reached in an instructive opinion, in which many of the authorities bearing upon the subject were examined, discussed, and distinguished.

In Godbout v. St. Paul Union Depot Co. 79 Minn. 188, 47 L. R. A. 532, 81 N. W. 835, the plaintiff's claim was the same as one position urged by the defendants in this case, and is stated by the court as follows: "Plaintiff, as a common carrier, has both the statutory and common-law right of entry to the Union depot, in common with other common carriers accorded the privilege; but if no common carrier has the legal right of entry, defendant cannot discriminate by admitting one to special privileges and excluding others." But this contention did not obtain the approval of the court. The right to make such discrimination was held to be no infringement of the rights of passengers, to whom alone the depot company owed the duty of providing reasonable facilities for leaving the station upon the completion of their railroad journey. Other cases supporting this conclusion are, Barney v. Oyster Bay & H. S. B. Co. 67 N. Y. 301, 23 Am. Rep. 115; Smith v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 149 Pa. 249, 24 Atl. 304; Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Old Dominion Baggage Co. 99 Va. 111, 50 L. R. A. 722, 37 S. E. 784; Fluker v. Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. 81 Ga. 461, 2 L. R. A. 843, 12 Am. St. Rep. 328, 8 S. E. 529; Kates v. Atlanta Baggage & Cab Co. 107 Ga. 636, 46 L. R. A. 431, 34 S. E. 372; Summitt v. State, 8 Lea, 413, 41 Am. Rep. 637; Snyder v. Union Depot Co. 19 Ohio C. C. 368; The D. R. Martin, 11 Blatchf. 235, Fed. Cas. No. 1,030; Barker v. Midland R. Co. 18 C. B. 46, 25 L. J. C. P. N. S. 184; Painter v. London, B. & S. C. R. Co. 2 C. B. N. S. 702; Boadell v. Eastern Counties R. Co. 2 C. B. N. S. 509, 26 L. J. C. R. N. S. 250, 5 Week. Rep. 650; Perth General Station Committee v. Ross [1897] A. C. 479, 66 L. J. P. C. N. S. 81,

From this examination of the authorities it is apparent that there is little substantial conflict of judicial opinion upon the exact question presented by the case at bar. As said by the court in the recent case last above cited, upon facts similar to those herein considered, it is "clearly established, by the great weight of authority in England and the United States, that complainant is entitled to the relief prayed for." That it is possible to discover general statements in some of the cases seemingly at variance with the views herein expressed is true; but the conflict thus suggested disappears in most of the cases, when the facts with reference to which the statements are made are given their proper qualifying effect. It is also to be noted that there is substantial unanimity expressed in the authorities, that the right of a hackman or a job teamster to enter a railroad station in the prosecution of his business, when it exists, is derived from, or is included in, the passenger's right, as against the railroad, to reasonable means of transportation for himself and baggage, and is not a right derived from any duty which the corporation owes him directly as a connecting common carrier. If it is bound to admit him to its station under any circumstances, it is so bound only when he is employed by a passenger, and hence represents the latter as his servant or agent, or when it fails to afford the passenger reasonable facilities of egress from its grounds.

As the corporation does not claim it has the right to exclude job teamsters employed by its passengers to bring baggage to the station for transportation on the cars or to meet them on their arrival, and as it is admitted that, under its contract with Hedding, its passengers will receive better service at the station, with reference to opportunities for the removal of their baggage, than could be afforded by the presence there of an unnecessary number of unemployed truckmen engaged in the solicitation of passengers for the carriage of their baggage, its right to exclude the defendants from its station when there on their private business is as broad and unlimited as that of any owner of real estate to expel persons trespassing upon his premises. If its duty to its passengers is fully and satisfactorily discharged by other instrumentalities, there is no reason, arising from considerations of public convenience or necessity, why the additional burden should be imposed upon it, as a property owner, to furnish standing room in its station for other people to render the performance of that duty less efficient and more disagreeable to the traveling public. If the public is entitled to the best service at railroad terminals, and if it provides such service, it would be a palpable absurdity to say that it must, upon grounds of public policy, permit that service to be crippled and paralyzed by the admission to its stations of large numbers of irresponsible men clamorously seeking the privilege of performing the same service. But if its duty to its passengers does not require the presence, on the arrival of trains, of soliciting agents for the transfer of baggage, it is difficult to explain why it is obliged to permit others to perform that service, or why, if it makes arrangements for such unnecessary convenience of its passengers, by engaging competent men for the work, it must also furnish facilities for others to engage in the same enterprise without compensation. An onerous duty of that character can only be imposed by legislative action.

Exceptions sustained.

Parsons, Ch. J., and Remick and Bingham, JJ., concur. Chase, J., does not concur, because the questions were decided when the case was previously before the court (89 N. H. 650, 76 Am. St. Rep. 204, 45 Atl. 96, and 70 N. H. 631, 47 Atl. 614), and he is not convinced that the decision ought to be overruled.

Rehearing denied.

In discussing the subject of conflict of laws respecting sales of personal property, a broad distinction is to be observed between those questions that relate to the personal rights and obligations of the parties under the contract and those that relate to the title or interest transferred or reserved. Questions of the first class are to be determined upon the general principles that apply to personal contracts, and, ordinarily, the choice of laws, so far as these questions are concerned, is between the lex

CROSS-APPEALS from a judgment of the Judicial District Court for the Parish of Acadia settling the accounts of the administrator of C. J. Welsh, deceased; opponents appealing from so much of the judgment as rejected their claims to preference; and the administrator appealing from so much as allowed a preference in case of one of the opponents. Modified.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Robert Montgomery and Shelby Taylor for appellants.Messrs. Story & Pugh, for appellee:

The sale was consummated at the residence of the vendor.

To uphold vendor's privilege it must be shown to exist by the law of vendor's domicile.

loci contractus as such (i. e., the law of the place where the contract is made) and the lex loci solutionis (i. e., the law of the place where the contract is performable).—questions relating to the remedy being, of course, referred to the lex fori. The lex domicilii, as such (i. e., the law of the owner's domicile), or the lex situs, as such (i. e., the law of the place where the property is situated), is seldom, if ever, properly applied to this class of questions. It is true that the application of the general principles by which the governing law of personal contracts in general is determined will frequently subject a contract of sale, even in the aspect of it now under consideration, to the law of the domicile of the owner, or the law of the place where the property is situated; indeed, as will subsequently be shown, the location of the property necessarily determines the place of the executed contract of sale when the executory contract does not specifically identify the property, but this fact does not militate against the proposition that the contract, considered from the point of view of the personal rights and obligations of the parties to it, is not governed by the lex situs as such.

Coming to the second class of questions, namely, those that relate to the title or interest transferred or reserved by the contract, it will be observed that they are frequently referred to the lex situs. In such case, however, the additional query arises, whether the applicatory law is that of the place where the property is located at the time of the contract, or that of the place where it is located at a time the subsequent transaction with reference to it takes place.

The justification for, and the exemplification of, the distinctions here stated will be shown in

When an agent of a nonresident dealer has authority only to exhibit samples and receive orders, which he communicates to his principal for acceptance or rejection, an order so transmitted is similar in every respect to an order to purchase, sent direct to the buyer from the seller; and, when accepted and filled, and the goods delivered to the carrier and insured by the buyer, it is a contract made where said order is accepted and filled and the goods are delivered.

divisions III. and IV., infra. In the meantime, however, it is apparent that the determination of the question, where the contract, under varying circumstances, is deemed to have been made, is important in determining the governing law in either aspect of the contract; and the next division will be devoted to the discussion of that point.

II. Place of contract; distinction between executory and executed contract.

This subdivision is confined to the single question as to where the contract is, under varying circumstances, deemed to have been made, for the purposes of the principles governing the choice of laws. The consequences dependent upon the location of the place of the making of the contract are discussed in III. and IV., infra.

In discussing this question, it is important to observe the distinction between the executory contract and the executed contract. When the subject of the sale is specific property, identified and appropriated at the time the executory contract is made, the distinction between the executory and executed contracts is immaterial, since they are both consummated by the same act, at the same time, and at the same place. When, however, the executory contract relates to property of a particular species or class, without identifying or appropriating to the contract any particular property of that species or class, it remains executory until there has been such an identification and appropriation; and in such case the executory contract may be made in one state, and the executed contract in another.

When the parties to the contract meet and enter into the contract in person, there is no difficulty in determining the place where the executory contract is made. The difficulty arises when the contract is made by correspondence, or through the intervention of an agent of one of the parties. When a definite proposition to buy or to sell is sent through the mail from one state or country to another, the executory contract is completed as soon as a definite and unconditional acceptance of the proposition is deposited in the mail in the latter state or country; and the executory contract is therefore deemed to have been made in that state; and, if the contract is with reference to specific property already identified, that will ordinarily be the place of the executed contract, although 64 L. R. A.

this result is, of course, controlled by the intention of the parties. Emerson Co. v. Proctor, 97 Me. 360, 54 Atl. 849; Shelby Steel Tube Co. v. Burgess Gun Co. 8 App. Div. 444, 40 N. Y. Supp. 871. This principle is supported by many cases that do not involve any question as to conflict of laws.

The question also arises as to the place where the executory contract is deemed to have been made when an order for goods not specifically identified and appropriated is taken in one state by the agent of the vendor, and filed in another where the vendor does business. If the vendor's agent is merely authorized to solicit and receive orders subject to acceptance or rejection by the principal, and does not, in fact, undertake to make a binding contract of sale, it is clear that the executory contract is made in the state in which the order is finally accepted by the vendor. Aultman, M. & Co. v. Holder, 68 Fed. 467. See also note to Brown v. Wieland, 61 L. R. A. 417, 424, div. III.

Upon the other hand, if the agent has authority to make a binding contract of sale, and undertakes to do so, it is clear that the place of the executory contract is the place where he exercises such authority, notwithstanding that the vendor does business in another state, and that the stock from which the contract is to be filled is in that state. Penninghaus v. Jacobs, 12 Lanc. L. Rev. 203. See also note to Brown v. Wieland, 61 L. R. A. 417, 424, div. III.

But it has been held that, even if the agent exceeded his authority in undertaking to make a binding contract of sale, the ratification thereof by the principal in another state relates back to the time of the making of the contract by the agent, and therefore makes the state in which the agent acted the locus contractus of the executory contract. McLane v. His Creditors, 47 La. Ann. 134, 16 So. 764; Erman v. Lehman, 47 La. Ann. 1651, 18 So. 650. See also Golson v. Ebert, 52 Mo. 260.

But a contract for the purchase of machinery from an Ohio corporation having its principal place of business in that state, signed in Michigan by a resident of that state, and also countersigned there by the vendor's agent, is an Ohio contract, where it was approved at the principal office of the corporation in Ohio pursuant to a provision that it should not be valid unless approved there; and the contract is, therefore, not within a Michigan statute re-

99 Am. Dec. 670; Taylor v. Pickett, 52 Iowa, 469, 3 N. W. 514.

Provosty, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The administrator having filed his final account, with the Texas Moline Plow Company, and the Southern Rock Island Plow Company, of Dallas, Texas, and T. & H. Smith & Co., of Dakin, Illinois, as ordinary creditors thereon, these parties filed oppositions, claiming the vendor's privilege on the proceeds of goods sold by them to the deceased, and inventoried and sold with the other effects of the succession, but separately, after having been identified by them as their goods, yet unpaid for. The administrator denies the privilege, because, he says, lating to contracts made in that state. Aultman, M. & Co. v. Holder, 68 Fed. 467.

Delivery of the property is generally, though not necessarily, the act by which the executory contract, when the particular property has not been previously identified and appropriated, becomes an executed contract; and therefore, in such case, the place of delivery is generally the place where the executed contract is deemed to have been made. When there is no provision in the contract as to the place of delivery, and the property, pursuant to the express or implied understanding of the parties, is delivered by the seller to a common carrier in one state to be transported to another, and there turned over to the buyer, the weight of authority holds that the former, rather than the latter, state is to be regarded as the place where the executed contract is made, in the absence of circumstances rebutting the presumption of the carrier's implied authority to receive the goods for the buyer. Brandon Printing Co. v. Bostick, 126 Ala. 247, 28 So. 705; Atlantic Phosphate Co. v. Ely, 82 Ga. 488, 9 S. E. 170; Fröhlich v. Alexander, 36 Ill. App. 428; Brinker v. Scheunemann, 43 Ill. App. 639; Kruider v. Ellison, 47 N. Y. 86, 7 Am. Rep. 402; Lowrey v. Ulmer, 1 Pa. Super. Ct. 425; Braunn v. Keally, 146 Pa. 519, 28 Am. St. Rep. 811, 23 Atl. 389; Perlman v. Sartorius, 162 Pa. 820, 42 Am. St. Rep. 834, 29 Atl. 852; City Bank v. Easton Boot & Shoe Co. 187 Pa. 80, 40 Atl. 1026. See also note to Brown v. Wieland, 61 L. R. A. 422. This rule is also supported by many cases involving no question as to conflict of laws.

The last rule, however, presupposes a valid executory contract, for, in the absence of such contract, there is no foundation for the carrier's implied agency upon which the rule rests. (See cases cited in note to Brown v. Wieland, 61 L. R. A. 417, 422, under heading, Statute of frauds.)

Of course, if the terms of the contract, or the circumstances of the transaction, are such as to show that the parties did not intend the title to pass until actual delivery to the purchaser by the carrier, the executed contract is consummated in the state in which that act is done, and not in the state in which the property is delivered to the carrier. (See, upon this point, note to Brown v. Wieland, 61 L. R. A. 417, 421, 422, where the principle and its limitations and qualifications are applied to contracts relating to the sale of intoxicating liquors.)

the sales were made at the domicile of the opponents in other states, and are governed by the laws of those states, which do not recognize the privilege in question.

In their brief the counsel for the administrator say that "the question in their several oppositions to be determined by this court is whether the contracts sued on are Louisiana contracts." We are not called upon, therefore, to look into the facts of the case, except in connection with this question.

In each of the cases the goods were sold through a drummer. The drummer took from the deceased, Welsh, who was a going merchant at Crowley, Louisiana, an unconditional written order for the goods, accepting same subject to approval by his prin-

A sale of goods by sample, to be shipped from Illinois to Michigan, is not made a Michigan contract, subject to the Michigan statute of frauds, by the buyer's reservation of a right to reject them after examination in Michigan if not like the samples; but the sale is complete, and title passes upon delivery to the carrier in Illinois. Kuppenheimer v. Werthelmer, 107 Mich. 77, 61 Am. St. Rep. 317, 64 N. W. 952.

A contract for the conditional sale of machinery, negotiated in a foreign state by citizens thereof, and contemplating a delivery therein, is deemed to have been made therein, and is governed by the law thereof, although the seller agrees to send a man to set up the machinery at a place within New Hampshire. Cleveland Mach. Works v. Lang, 67 N. H. 348, 68 Am. St. Rep. 675, 31 Atl. 20.

III. Personal rights and obligations under the contract.

a. In general; construction of contract; warranty.

The Indiana statute regulating sales of patent rights applies to sales, made in that state, of rights to be exercised in another state. Robertson v. Cooper, 1 Ind. App. 78, 27 N. E. 104.

The words "cured meat," in a contract of sale made by a broker with a merchant at Memphis, to which point the meat was to be shipped, are to be interpreted according to the understanding of the trade at Memphis, and not according to that of the place where the seller resides, and where, by the terms of the contract, the meat was to be delivered on board the cars. Treadwell v. Anglo-American Packing Co. 13 Fed. 22.

But the merchantable quality of goods is to be determined by the law of the place where the goods are to be delivered. Ladd v. Dulany, 1 Cranch C. C. 583, Fed. Cas. No. 7,971.

The question whether there is an implied warranty against hidden defects upon the sale of a vessel in New Orleans is to be determined by the law of Louisiana, rather than by the law of New York, although the vendors resided in the latter state. Bulkeley v. Honold, 19 How. 390, 15 L. ed. 663. The decision is upon the ground that the contract was made and to be performed in Louisiana.

The question as to the existence of an implied warranty upon a sale of personal property is to be determined by the law of Pennsylincipal, and the goods were shipped in due course. One of the shipments by the Texas Moline Plow Company was made from Gueydan, Louisiana, and will be considered later separately.

The case is undistinguishable from that of Claffin v. Mayer, 41 La. Ann. 1048, 7 So. 139, and under the doctrine of that case the privilege is denied.

In each of the cases it was sought to be proved by parol evidence that the traveling agent had full power to bind the principal, and that the stipulation touching approval by the principal was a mere empty or accidental and meaningless formality. But this parol evidence was properly objected to as contradicting or varying the written contract.

The lower court accorded a privilege to the Texas Moline Plow Company, and rejected the two other oppositions. Doubtless this privilege was thus accorded on the strength of the testimony of the traveling agent of the opponent company to the effect that the consignee, Welsh, refused to accept the goods, and that thereupon an arrangement was made by which he kept them as goods belonging to the Texas Moline Plow Company, to be paid for when sold; and that later in the fall, after some of the wagons and one of the buggies had been sold, and a settlement being asked for them, Welsh proposed that, if certain discounts were made, he would take the goods, and give his notes for the price, and that this was done.

Counsel for the administrator says that, as against a dead man, whose lips are sealed, this testimony must be taken cum grano salis, and the situation impresses us in the same way. The written contract stipulated that the order was not subject to revocation except upon payment of 20 per cent of the net amount of the goods. The order was a considerable one,—$1,219. The goods had been shipped from another state, and the consignee was a merchant in regular business. The manager, the assistant manager, and the adjuster of the company seem to have known nothing of this taking back vania if the sale was made and perfected in that state. Snow v. Schomacker Mfg. Co. 69 Ala. 111, 44 Am. Rep. 506. The only conflict in this case seems to have been between the lex loci contractus and lex fori.

The law of Massachusetts giving the vendee, in a conditional sale of personal property, a right to redeem, becomes a part of such a contract made in that state, and will be applied by a court of Maine in a controversy between the vendor and creditors of the vendee who attached the property after its removal to Maine. Gross v. Jordan, 83 Me. 380, 22 Atl. 250. The decision is upon the broad ground that the law of the place where a contract is made determines its meaning and validity.

The requirement of Mo. Rev. Stat. 1889, § 5181, as a condition precedent to the right of a vendor of personal property, who reserves title until payment of the purchase price, to sue for the recovery of the property, that he shall refund the purchase money already received less 25 per cent, pertains to the remedy, and is, therefore, inapplicable in an action in Arkansas founded on a sale in Missouri. Public Parks Amusement Co. v. Embree-McLean Carriage Co. 64 Ark. 29, 40 S. W. 582.

b. Laws prohibiting or regulating the sale of property.

The principles governing this branch of the subject are fully set forth and illustrated by the cases cited in the note to Brown v. Wieland, 61 L. R. A. 417, upon the subject of Conflict of laws as to sales of intoxicating liquor. The same principles have been applied in several cases involving statutes regulating the sale of fertilizers. Thus:

Where a contract for the sale of fertilizers, though dated in Georgia, was in fact signed by both parties in Alabama, and the notes for the purchase price were also signed there and payable at a bank there, upon the delivery of the fertilizers there, the transaction is an Alabama transaction, and the notes are void if the requirements of the Alabama statute with reference to the sale of fertilizers were not complied with. Johnson v. Hanover Nat. Bank. 88 Ala. 271, 6 So. 909, 90 Ala. 549, 8 So. 42.

The statutes of Georgia touching the inspection of fertilizers, which relate solely to such as are "offered for sale or distribution in this state," do not affect the validity of notes given for the purchase price of fertilizers which a farmer, residing in Georgia, ordered by letter, written in that state, to be sent him from South Carolina by a dealer in the latter state, the goods to be shipped by railroad. Atlantic Phosphate Co. v. Ely, 82 Ga. 438, 9 S. E. 170. The decision is upon the ground that the contract of sale was a South Carolina contract, being consummated by the acceptance of the order in South Carolina and compliance therewith by putting the goods on board the cars consigned, as directed, to the purchaser in Georgia. The note in this case was executed in Georgia upon the receipt of the goods there, and, so far as appears, was also payable in Georgia; but it will be observed that the decision turns entirely upon the question where the contract of sale was made, and not upon the question where the note itself was made or payable.

Martin v. Upshur Guano Co. 77 Ga. 257, is to the same effect as the preceding case, except that the purchaser was a retailer.

So, an action will lie in Pennsylvania to recover the purchase price of oleomargarine, furnished under a contract made in Illinois and delivered to a carrier there, to be shipped into Pennsylvania, the purchaser paying the freight, notwithstanding that the seller knew that the purchaser intended to sell the goods contrary to the statute of Pennsylvania declaring void contracts for the sale of oleomargarine. Braunn v. Keally, 146 Pa. 519, 28 Am. St. Rep. 811, 23 Atl. 389. The decision is upon the ground that the sale was completed by delivery of the oleomargarine to the carrier in Illinois, and that the Pennsylvania statute has no extraterritorial operation. The court says the seller's knowledge that the purchaser might, or even that he intended to, sell the goods contrary to the law the goods and subsequently selling them, for they make no allusion to it in their testimony. Then, again, the witness says that the goods thus refused to be accepted were sold to Welsh "later in the fall," and that "certain discounts" were made. Now, the notes were taken for the whole price,—that is to say, apparently, without any discount having been made; and the short time intervening between the taking of the notes and the shipment of the goods would hardly justify the expression "later in the fall." The notes were made on October 15th, and the goods were invoiced at Dallas, Texas, on September 23d. Allowing a few days for them to reach destination, Crowley, Louisiana, and barely twenty days intervened between the alleged refusal to receive them and the alleged resale of them later in the fall.

The testimony would more nearly fit the shipment made from Gueydan, Louisiana. The date of that shipment was August 27th, and the date of the note given for it is November 17th. The note is for an amount less than the amount of the invoice, and the goods included buggies, and it is said that Welsh advanced as a reason for not receiving them that they were damaged. Here was a reason for refusing to accept, and here, also, is a discount, and also a delay such as might justify the expression "later in the fall."

Be the foregoing as it may, however, we have concluded to allow the privilege on this shipment from Gueydan, Louisiana, for another reason. The sale as to it was consummated at Gueydan, Louisiana, by the segregation of the particular goods from the stock there on hand, and thus, under the doctrine of State v. Shields, 110 La. 547, 34 So. 673, was a Louisiana contract.

The judgment appealed from is amended so as to reduce it to $500, with 8 per cent per annum interest from December 9, 1901, the amount for which a privilege is allowed to the Texas Moline Plow Company, and as thus amended it is affirmed; the opponents to pay the costs of this appeal.

of Pennsylvania could not vitiate a contract made and executed in Illinois. The opinion does not refer to the public policy of the forum as a possible ground for refusing to enforce the contract upon the assumption that it was valid by the law of Illinois.

Parsons Oil Co. v. Boyett, 44 Ark. 230, is to the same effect as the last case. The decision, however, is conditioned upon the fact that the seller is not to actively participate or be interested in the resale of the goods by the buyer in violation of law.

It will be observed that, according to the rules stated in II., supra, the executed and executory contracts involved in the last two cases were consummated in the same state; but in the next case the two contracts were consummated in different states; and the question is referred to the law of the state where the executed contract was consummated.

Where a contract is made in Iowa for the sale of a gambling device to be delivered in Illinois, the validity of the sale and promise to pay are to be determined by the laws of Illinois. Price v. Burns, 101 Ill. App. 418.

It will be observed that, notwithstanding the actions in the first two cases were upon notes for the purchase price, and not upon the original contract of sale, the governing law was determined by applying the general principle to that contract, rather than to the notes. That was because the validity of a note, as affected by the consideration, is necessarily determined by the law that determines the validity of the original contract which furnishes the purported consideration. (For further illustration of this principle, see note to Brown v. Wieland, 61 L. R. A. 417, 433, div. VI.)

c. As to rescission of sale for fraud; resolatory condition.

There are some divergencies in the laws of different states as to the circumstances under which a vendor may rescind the sale and recover the property upon the ground of the vendee's fraud in respect of his financial condition and ability to pay; and it therefore sometimes becomes necessary to determine what law shall govern in this respect. There seems to be a tendency upon the part of the courts to refer this question to the law of the place where the executed contract is made (generally the law of the place where the property was delivered). Thus:

The question as to what constitutes a fraud on the part of a purchaser of goods which will entitle the seller to rescind is to be determined by the law of New York, where the order for the goods was given to the traveling salesman of the seller in Pennsylvania, the goods to be delivered on board the cars in New York, the buyer paying the freight. Lowrey v. Ulmer, 38 W. N. C. 232. This decision seems to be upon the assumption that the salesman had authority to accept the order. The court says the contract was executory in Pennsylvania, that the order was only part of the contract, and that the owners had a right to refuse to deliver up to the time of parting with the legal control of their property, and that the sale was, therefore, completed upon the delivery of the goods to the common carrier in New York.

So, in Mann v. Salsberg, 17 Pa. Super. Ct. 280, the court said that, if the goods were delivered at Baltimore to a common carrier consigned to the purchaser in Pennsylvania, the contract was a Maryland contract, and the rule in that state with respect to the vendor's right to rescind was to be applied. It appeared that the order for the goods was taken in Pennsylvania by a traveling salesman of a Maryland house, but it does not appear whether he had authority to accept the order, or merely to solicit it subject to acceptance or rejection by the principal in Maryland; and the court apparently assumed that the question turned upon the place where delivery was made, without reference to the place where the order was accepted.

While, in the cases next cited, the court seems to refer the question to the law of the state where the executed contract was consummated (i. e., to the law of the state of delivery), yet the executory contract seems also to have been made in that state by the acceptance of the order there.

The question as to what amounts to a fraud by the buyer upon the seller of goods, such as entitles the latter to rescind the sale, is to be determined by the law of Pennsylvania, where the order for the goods, which was in accordance with terms of sale agreed upon between the agents of the parties in Illinois, was sent from that state to the seller in Pennsylvania, the delivery being made to a railroad company in Philadelphia, which, the court says, in the absence of any agreement between the parties to the contrary, was, in law, a delivery to the purchaser. Kline v. Baker, 99 Mass. 253.

The law of the state where goods sold are situated, and the sellers live, governs a sale completed by delivery to a carrier in that state as to the question whether a purchase of goods by one knowing himself to be insolvent is void. Perلمان v. Sartorius, 162 Pa. 320, 42 Am. St. Rep. 834, 29 Atl. 832.

Where an order for goods from a resident of Pennsylvania is accepted in New York, and the goods are delivered in the latter state to the purchaser, the question as to the right to rescind the sale on the ground of fraud is to be determined by the law of New York. Whiting Mfg. Co. v. Fourth Street Nat. Bank, 15 Pa. Super. Ct. 419.

Where a resident of Pennsylvania buys goods in New York with a preconceived design not to pay for them, but to turn them over to other creditors, the right of the seller to rescind on the ground of fraud is to be determined by the law of New York. Arnold v. Shade, 3 Phila. 82.

The rule in Tennessee, that the mere fact that the purchaser knew he was insolvent at the time he purchased goods does not of itself entitle the vendor to rescind and replevin the goods, will be applied where a contract was made in that state, between a retail dealer thereof and a wholesale dealer of Georgia, under which goods were from time to time ordered by mail from Tennessee and shipped from Georgia and delivered in Tennessee, and paid for by acceptances on delivery, as agreed in the contract. Rome Furniture & Lumber Co. v. Walling (Tenn. Ch. App.) 58 S. W. 1094.

The next case apparently refers the question to the law of the state where the executory contract was made, although it may have been that the court regarded the delivery, and therefore the consummation of the executed contract, as having taken place in that state.

Where a traveling agent for a Maryland house receives in Pennsylvania an offer for goods at a lower price than he is authorized to sell, and telegraphs to his principal, who replies authorizing him to accept, and he accepts pursuant to such answer, the contract is to be regarded as a Pennsylvania contract, and therefore not subject to the law of Maryland to the effect that a sale to one who knows himself to be insolvent passes no title. Penninghaus v. Jacobs, 12 Lanc. L. Rev. 203.

In the foregoing cases the question arose between the vendor and a creditor of the vendee who had seized the goods under process, except in Rome Furniture & Lumber Co. v. Walling (Tenn. Ch. App.) 58 S. W. 1094, where the action was against an assignee for creditors of the vendee. In none of these cases, however, is the location of the property at the time of the seizure regarded as the criterion of the governing law with respect to this question. But in Tatum v. Wright, 7 La. Ann. 358, it was held that the law of another state where personal property is sold, which allows the seller to recover the property from the purchaser or a subsequent holder, when he has been swindled into taking counterfeit bank notes in payment, would not be applied where the property was subsequently brought into Louisiana, and a resident of that state advanced money upon it.

The resolutory condition is peculiar to the civil law, and does not enter into a contract of sale made in the state of New York, the goods being delivered in that state. Lalancé Grosjean Mfg. Co. v. Wolff, 28 La. Ann. 942.

d. As to right to maintain action for purchase price before expiration of credit.

Where goods are ordered through the mail by a person in Oklahoma from a person in New York, and the goods are delivered to a carrier in New York and transported to Oklahoma, the purchaser paying the freight at the latter place, the contract must be regarded as having been made in New York, and is, therefore, governed by the rule prevailing in that state, whereby the seller may sue to recover the purchase price before the expiration of the period of credit if the goods were obtained by false representations. Jaffray v. Wolf, 4 Okla. 303, 47 Pac. 496.

The last case assumes that the question relates to the substantive rights of the parties, and not to the remedy merely; but Galloyway v. Holmes, 1 Dougl. (Mich.) 330, held that the law of the place where a sale of goods on credit was made, which enables the vendor, in case of fraud on the part of the purchaser, to maintain assumpsit for the price before the expiration of the credit, affects the remedy only, and does not apply so as to enable the vendor to maintain such an action in another state.

IV. The contract as affecting the title to, or interest in, property.

a. In general.

It is frequently stated as a fundamental principle that personal property has no situs of its own, but follows the person of the owner. Whitney v. Dodge, 105 Cal. 192, 38 Pac. 636; Allen v. Bain, 2 Head, 107; Williams v. Pope Mfg. Co. 52 La. Ann. 1417, 50 L. R. A. 818, 78 Am. St. Rep. 390, 27 So. 851. If that principle were to be conceded without qualification, the general rule frequently stated by the courts, that the validity of a transfer of personal property depends upon the law of the seller's domicile, would be clearly deducible therefrom. Conceding the general principle, however, its practical scope and effect are greatly reduced by the co-ordinate principle which is clearly stated, in its relation to the general principle, in the following language quoted from Smead v. Chandler (Ark.) 76 S. W. 1066: "Every state has jurisdiction over all property, personal and real, within its territorial limits, and, within the bounds of legislation, may regulate and control it in such manner as to it may seem fit or expedient. It may provide how far the laws of a foreign state, in which a contract or transfer or mortgage of property has been made, shall govern in the enforcement of such contract, transfer, or mortgage by its courts, or that its own laws shall be the only rule observed in such cases. But when it has not done so, the general rule is 'that the nature, the obligation, and the interpretation of personal contracts and contracts concerning movable property are governed, in such a state, by the laws of the place where they are made, unless the parties at the time of making them have some other law in view.' Liverpool & G. W. Steam Co. v. Phenix Ins. Co. 129 U. S. 458, 32 L. ed. 798, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 469."

Although a court of one state may give effect to the law of domicile of another state, yet this is a mere principle of comity between the courts, which must give way when the statutes of a country where the property is situated, or the established policy of its laws, prescribe to its court a different rule. Walworth v. Harris, 129 U. S. 355, 32 L. ed. 712, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 340.

Many other cases have expressly recognized the effect of the conceded power of the state over the personal property within its jurisdiction to narrow and restrict the practical operation of the general principle that refers all the legal incidents of personal property to the law of the owner's domicile. See, especially, Green v. Van Buskirk, 7 Wall. 139, 19 L. ed. 109; Hervey v. Rhode Island Locomotive Works 93 U. S. 664, 23 L. ed. 1003; Pullman's Palace Car Co. v. Pennsylvania, 141 U. S. 18, 35 L. ed. 613, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 595, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 376. In Loftus v. Farmers' & M. Nat. Bank, 133 Pa. 97, 7 L. R. A. 313, 19 Atl. 347, after stating that a state has the power to change the rule that the validity of a transfer of personal property is to be determined by the law of the owner's domicile, so far as it relates to property within its borders, and to make the transfer thereof subject to its own laws, the court added: "Indeed it may be said that the tendency of modern authorities, under the influence of the European continental jurisprudence, is towards the recognition of the law of the situs to such an extent that what was an exception is tending to become the rule."

It is clear, from the authorities above cited, that the court of a state in which the property is situated may test the validity of a transfer or mortgage thereof by the domestic law, though made by a nonresident in another state, if, in its opinion, that law evinces a public policy which justifies its extension to contracts made under such circumstances, and must do so if that law expressly, and in terms, covers them, whatever the principles of private international law might otherwise require. Practically, then, the only case in which the court—at least a court of the state in which the property was located at the time of the contract—is left free to make a choice between the lex situs upon the one side, and lex domicilii or lex loci contractus, upon the other, is when the lex situs is not express or explicit upon the point. In such a case the general principles governing the choice of laws with respect to personal property may be invoked; but, even in such a case, those principles may be disregarded if, in the opinion of the court, the contract, notwithstanding its foreign element, comes within the public policy evinced by the lex situs. When the cases are examined with reference to the decisions actually rendered, it will be found (whether the result is attributable to general principles or to local policy is, perhaps, not material) that the majority of them apply the law of the place where the property is situated at the time of the contract to questions relating to the steps that must be taken to protect the title or interest acquired or reserved by the contract against the rights of third persons, e. g., subsequent purchasers or creditors of the parties, even when the terms of the law do not expressly require such application. When, however, the rights of the parties, or of third persons, in or to the property depend upon the original validity or effect of the contract of sale itself, the governing law is usually determined by the general principles governing personal contracts, and the lex situs, as such, is not to be applied, though, as already pointed out, the place where the property is situated may affect the application of such general principles to this class of contracts.

Many of the cases seem formally to refer the former class of questions to the lex domicilii or lex loci contractus (these are generally coincident), but it will ordinarily be found that the lex domicilii or lex loci contractus, as the case may be, was coincident with the lex situs, having reference to the time of the execution of the contract; and the fact that the lex situs is the applicatory law in this respect emerges clearly when the property was located at the time of the contract in a state other than that in which the contract was executed and the owner was domiciled. When a decision upon a question of this class appears to be against the lex situs, it will generally be found that it is merely against the law of the place to which the property was removed subsequently to the execution of the contract, and in favor of the law of the place where the property was located at the time the contract was executed.

The justification for the foregoing statements will be found in the cases cited in the following divisions of this note, and in the cases cited in the note to Sulder v. Yates, ante, 353, with reference to chattel mortgages.

b. Validity of sale depending upon transfer of possession generally.

. The question as to the necessity of delivery of possession of the property to the vendee in order to protect him against subsequent bona fide purchasers from, or creditors of, the vendor is sometimes apparently referred to the lex loci contractus; but in such cases it will, usually at least, be found that the property at the time of the contract was in the state where the contract was made; and the decisions are therefore not inconsistent with the position that this question is to be determined by the law of the place where the property is located at the time the contract is made. These cases are, however, authority for applying the law of the place where the property was situated at the time the contract was made, at least if coincident with the lex loci contractus, as opposed to the law of the place where the property was situated at the time of its subsequent sale by, or seizure under process against, the vendor.

The rule in New York, by which the retention of the possession of personal property by the vendor after the sale is only evidence of fraud, and does not authorize the court to pronounce the sale fraudulent per se, governs in determining the validity of the sale of a ship made in that state by vendors domiciled in Connecticut, notwithstanding that the vessel was subsequently attached by a creditor of the vendor while in his possession in Connecticut. Koster v. Merritt, 32 Conn. 240. The court in this case formally referred the question to the lex loci contractus as opposed to the lex fori; but it will be observed that the lex loci contractus and the lex situs (having reference to the situation at the time the contract was made) were coincident.

So, where horses and mules are sold while in Virginia, but are subsequently sent to Pennsylvania to be pastured, and are there seized under a foreign attachment by creditors of the vendor, the validity of the sale and transfer is to be tested by the law of Virginia, under which the retention of possession by the vendor is merely prima facie evidence of fraud which may be rebutted by proof, rather than by the law of Pennsylvania, under which such retention of possession is conclusive evidence of fraud. Born v. Shaw, 29 Pa. 288, 72 Am. Dec. 638.

A bill of sale executed in Maryland between residents of that state, and duly recorded there, will protect the property against attachment by a Maryland creditor of the vendor while it is in the latter's possession in Pennsylvania. Guthman v. Cole, 21 W. N. C. 96.

The validity of a sale of personal property, as against a subsequent attaching creditor of the seller, depending upon the question of the transfer of the possession, is to be determined by the law of Vermont, where the bill of sale was executed, delivered, and recorded in that state, and the property was there at that time, as well as at the time it was attached, notwithstanding that the contract of sale was written in Massachusetts. The seller in this case seems to have resided in Vermont. Ames v. McCamber, 124 Mass. 85.

The validity of a sale of personal property, made in New Hampshire where the property then was, is to be determined by the law of that state, notwithstanding that the vendor was domiciled in Vermont, in the absence of any evidence of an intention to evade the laws of the latter state. French v. Hall, 9 N. H. 137, 32 Am. Dec. 841. The purchaser, after having possession of the property for some time, let it for hire to the former owner to go into Vermont, where it was attached as his property and sold upon execution. The court held that, while the regularity of the proceedings in attaching and selling the property was to be determined by the law of Vermont, the validity of the title to the property under the contract of sale, and therefore its liability to attachment, was to be determined by the law of New Hampshire, where the sale was made; but it will be observed that the property was in New Hampshire at the time of the sale.

The Texas rule, that no title can be acquired to cattle running on the range except by registered bill of sale of marks and brands does not apply to cattle which were not within the state at the time of the sale, but were subsequently brought there and seized under process against the original owner,—especially when, at the time of such seizure, they were in possession of the purchaser. Ft. Worth Nat. Bank v. Daugherty, 81 Tex. 301, 16 S. W. 1028.

It will be observed that the case next cited, while holding that the lex loci contractus upon this point will prevail over the law of the place to which the property was removed after the sale, intimated that the law of the place where the property was at the time of the sale (excluding the law of the place where the property might happen to be in transitu) will prevail over the lex loci contractus if the two are opposed.

Where a vessel while at sea is sold in New York, where the parties are domiciled, and by the law of which delivery is not necessary to transfer the title, the vessel cannot, upon her arrival at New Orleans, be attached for a debt of the vendor. Thuret v. Jenkins, 7 Mart. (La.) 818, 12 Am. Dec. 508. The court impliedly concedes that the decision would have been different if the vessel had been in Louisiana at the time of the sale.

A sale of goods, without delivery, while in transitu from Tennessee to Louisiana, being valid by the law of Tennessee, where the sale was made and where the parties resided, the goods will not be subject to attachment by a creditor of the seller when they reach Louisiana; although, if the goods had been in the latter state at the time of sale, an attachment would have been sustained, because, by the law of that state, a sale without delivery is invalid as against creditors. Fell v. Darden, 17 La. Ann. 236.

But it was held in McKaig v. Jones, 2 Clark (Pa.) 123, that, although by the law of Maryland a bill of sale of personal property, duly recorded, is valid, notwithstanding the vendor retains possession, yet, if the property is brought into Pennsylvania by the vendor, it is liable to the executions of his creditors in that state.

The above case, in making the law of the state into which the property was subsequently removed prevail over that in which it was located at the time of the sale, is against the weight of authority, and is opposed to the principle applied in the subsequent case of Born v. Shaw, 29 Pa. 288, 72 Am. Dec. 638, decided in the same state.

In the two cases next cited; it will be observed that the property was, at the time of the sale, in a state other than that in which the sale was made.

Personal property which is in Louisiana at the time of a sale thereof is subject to attachment by a creditor of the seller after the sale but before the delivery, although, by the law of another state, where the sale was made, and where the parties were domiciled, delivery is not essential to protect the purchaser against the seller's creditors. Olivier v. Townes, 2 Mart. N. S. 98.

A bill of sale of a slave, which was executed in Virginia and was valid by the law of that state, will protect the purchaser as against a subsequent purchaser from a third person, who, at the time of the Virginia sale, held the slave in North Carolina as a bailee of the original vendor, notwithstanding that the bill of sale was neither proved nor registered, nor had a subscribing witness, as required by the law of North Carolina. Drewry v. Phillips, 44 N. C. (Busbee L.) 82. The court conceded that the rule would have been different if the defendant were claiming as a creditor, or under a creditor, of the original vendor.

When the cases above cited are considered together, and those that apparently refer the question to the lex loci contractus are considered in the light of the fact that the property involved was at the time of the sale located in the state where the sale was made, they seem to justify the statement that the necessity of a delivery of possession, in order to protect the purchaser of personal property against subsequent bona fide purchasers from, or creditors of, the vendor, is to be determined, neither by the lex domicilii, nor lex loci contractus as such, but by the law of the place where the property is located at the time of the original sale. In this respect, therefore, there is an exception to the general principle, so frequently stated by the courts, that personal property has no situs of its own, but follows the person of the owner.

Walp v. Lamkin, 76 Conn. 515, 57 Atl. 277, however, while conceding that, as a general principle, a sale of personal property, valid by the laws of the place where made and where the property is then situated, should be deemed valid everywhere, held that a sale, made in New York, of goods then in that state, but which had previously constituted the entire stock of a retail dealer in Connecticut, who, with the intent to defraud his creditors, had sold the same in a single transaction, and not in the regular course of business, to the person who subsequently sold them in New York, could not be upheld as against the creditors of the retailer, the sale by the latter not having been recorded as required by the law of Connecticut, and it appearing that the New York purchaser knew of the retailer's fraudulent purpose, although the intermediate purchaser did not, and that the goods were re-shipped to Connecticut immediately after the second purchase, they not having been in New York more than one day. The decision is upon the ground that, in view of the circumstances, it would be contrary to the public policy of Connecticut to recognise the validity of the second purchase.

e. Vendor's Lien.

It is clear, under the authorities, that a vendor is not entitled to the vendor's lien for the purchase price allowed by the statute of a particular state, when neither the executory nor executed contract was completed in that state, though the purchaser was a resident of that state, and it was contemplated at the time that the property would be taken to that state. Thus, it will be observed that, in the three cases next cited, as well as WELSH'S SUCCESSION, which deny a vendor's lien under the Louisiana statute, both executory and executed contracts were consummated out of that state, though it was contemplated at the time that the property was to be taken to that state.

A sale of goods must be regarded as made in England, and therefore the vendor is not entitled to the vendor's lien given by the Louisiana statute, where the order was sent by mail from Louisiana to the vendor in England, and there executed by the latter. Whiston v. Stodder, 8 Mart. (La.) 95, 13 Am. Dec. 281. The Louisiana statute creating the vendor's privilege appertains to the contract itself, and not to the remedy for enforcing its execution and, therefore, does not apply where the sale was made outside of the state. Ibid.

The vendor's lien under the Louisiana statute does not attach upon the removal of personal property to that state after its sale in another. Copley v. Sanford, 2 La. Ann. 335, 46 Am. Dec. 548; Colt v. O'Callaghan, 2 La. Ann. 984.

Where an agent in New Orleans for dealers in New York has authority only to exhibit samples and receive orders, which he communicates to his principal for acceptance or rejection, the contract and sale are deemed to be made in New York when the order is accepted and the goods are delivered to the carrier in that state, in the absence of any stipulation for delivery in New Orleans, and the seller is not entitled to a vendor's lien under the Louisiana statute. Clafin v. Mayer, 41 La. Ann. 1048, 7 So. 139.

A sale of a machine by an Ohio corporation to a purchaser in Louisiana, to be forwarded "by quickest route, making best rate" for the purchasers, is an Ohio, and not a Louisiana, contract; and the vendor is not entitled to a lien under the Louisiana statute, although a representative of the seller goes to Louisiana to be present at the starting of the machine, and the seller accepts a time draft in lieu of the cash payment provided for. G. A. Gray Co. v. Taylor Bros. Iron-Works Co. 14 C. C. A. 56, 23 U. S. App. 671, 66 Fed. 686.

Upon the other hand, if the executed contract is consummated in the state which allows the lien, by the delivery of the property there, it is clear that the vendor is entitled to the lien, although the executory contract was consummated in another state. Thus:

Where an executory contract for the sale of goods was made in New York, but the delivery took place in Louisiana, the contract must be considered as completed in Louisiana, and the vendor's lien given by the law of that state attaches. Overend v. Robinson, 10 La. Ann. 728.

McIlvaine v. Legare, 36 La. Ann. 359, makes the question, whether the vendor of movables is entitled to the vendor's privilege accorded by the Louisiana statute, dependent upon the question, whether the sale was consummated in, Louisiana or elsewhere; and the lien was upheld in this case, it appearing that the goods were to be delivered in Louisiana and paid for on inspection.

A contract made in New York for the delivery and erection of cotton presses on premises in Louisiana, the acceptance being dependent upon the success of a stipulated test to be applied to the presses after erection, is to be construed with reference to the law of Louisiana, and the presses are therefore subject to the vendor's privilege accorded by that law. De La Vergne Refrigerating Mach. Co. v. New Orleans & W. R. Co. 51 La. Ann. 1738, 26 So. 455. Here it will be observed that the right to the lien is made to depend upon the fact that the final acceptance, by which the contract was consummated, took place in Louisiana.

Sales made in Louisiana, by agents of nonresident vendors duly authorised, of goods to be delivered and actually delivered in the state, constitute Louisiana contracts, subject to the law of that state and entailing the vendor's privilege. Newman v. Cannon, 43 La. Ann. 712, 9 So. 489. In this case both executory and executed contracts were consummated in Louisiana; but it is clear, upon the authority of the case last cited, that the fact that the executed contract was consummated in that state would, alone, have been sufficient to entitle the vendor to the lien under its statute.

As elsewhere shown, the delivery and acceptance of the property is ordinarily the final act by which the executed contract is completed; when the particular property is not identified by the executory contract itself; and therefore the place where the property is delivered and accepted, in such a case, is the place of the executed contract.

It will be observed, however, that it is the lex loci contractus, as such, and not the lex situs, as such, that is to be applied to the sub.

ject of the vendor's lien. The distinction is not practically important when the executory contract has reference to an unidentified portion of a larger mass of property, since, ex hypothesi, the executed contract will necessarily be consummated in the state where the property is situated at the time. The distinction, however, becomes a practical one when the sale is of specific identified property, since in that case delivery is not essential to the consummation of the executed contract, and that contract may, therefore, be consummated in a state other than that in which the property is located. The distinction alluded to is illustrated by the case next cited.

A vendor's privilege does not attach to contracts made in a state where the parties are domiciled, by the law of which no such privilege exists, even if a portion of the goods were in New Orleans at the time of the contract,—movables having no situs as a general rule. Brent v. Shouse, 16 La. Ann. 158, 79 Am. Dec. 573.

The question remains, whether the vendor is entitled to the lien when the executory contract is consummated in the state which allows a lien, but the executed contract is consummated by the delivery of the property in another state. The Louisiana supreme court, in McLane v. His Creditors, 47 La. Ann. 134, 16 So. 764, answers that question in the affirmative, or, at least, it holds that, if the executory contract is consummated in Louisiana, the vendor is entitled to the lien, notwithstanding that the executory contract did not identify the particular property, and notwithstanding that the delivery to a carrier in another state is to be regarded as a delivery to the purchaser. In one part of the opinion the court distinguishes between delivery to, and acceptance by, the purchaser, apparently regarding the acceptance as taking place in Louisiana; and in that view the executed, as well as the executory contract would be actually (not by a fiction of law merely) consummated in that state. In a subsequent part of the opinion, however, the court seems to put the decision upon the ground that the acceptance, quoad the place of delivery, relates back to the consummation of the executory contract. The court said in this connection: "It is true that, quoad certain results and certain parties, the executory nature of the contract might bring about important differences between the situation in the two cases; but, if matters ultimately took the shape of actual acceptance and actual delivery without the intervention of disturbing factors, the legal situation, in our opinion, is that which we have indicated." While the court thus apparently rendered the decision upon the hypothesis that the title to the property passed when it was delivered to the carrier in the other state, it said: "We are by no means prepared to say, however, as a matter of fact, that the ownership of these goods, whether viewed from the standpoint of a Louisiana, or that of a Missouri, contract, would shift in Missouri at the time, and by the fact of the segregation of a particular machine from among a number of others at the company's factory, and its being brought directly under the operation of the contract by appropriation. McLane had never seen the particular machine which would ultimately be brought in under the contract. It was in contemplation of both parties that it should reach him in Louisiana, and that while there in his possession a portion of the price would be still unpaid. It would be fair to presume, in absence of express stipulation to the contrary, that McLane should reserve right of final acceptance to a reasonable time after its receipt by him at Franklin, and that both parties should contract with reference to the operation of the laws of Louisiana upon the enforcement of the rights of the seller."

The doctrine of the foregoing case was approved and applied in Erman v. Lehman, 47 La. Ann. 1651, 18 So. 630. (See II., supra, for the discussion of this case in its bearing upon the point where the executory contract was consummated.)

While in most of the cases thus far cited the controversy respecting the lien was between the vendor upon one side, and persons claiming through or under the purchaser upon the other, the question turned upon the original existence of a lien, and not upon the steps necessary to preserve or enforce, against third persons, a lien existing under the statute and contract. Assuming the existence of such a lien under the statute of a particular state, the question arises whether it will survive the removal of the property to another state, and will be enforced against purchasers from, or creditors of, the vendee in the latter state.

Whether or not a seller of personal property has a lien for the unpaid purchase price as against subsequent attaching creditors of the vendee is to be determined by the law of the state where the property was at the time of the attachment, and not by the law of the state where the property was sold. Barney & S. Mfg. Co. v. Hart, 8 Ky. L. Rep. 223, 1 S. W. 414. In this case the sale was made in Ohio, and the property was attached in Kentucky after its removal to that state. The court said that there may have been a valid lien by the law of Ohio, but it had no effect in Kentucky because there was no record of the lien as required by the law of the latter state.

But a vendor's lien created by an Alabama statute, which provides that, when a contract is made for the sale of cotton in Mobile, and by the general usage of trade in that city it is considered a sale for cash, but the broker or agent is allowed a reasonable time to examine, reweigh, and resample the cotton before paying for it, the seller shall have a lien upon the cotton to continue for fifteen days from the time when the cotton, or an order for its delivery on a warehouseman shall be delivered.—will be enforced by a court of Louisiana as against a bank which advanced money upon the faith of the purchaser's title to the cotton, where all the parties to the controversy are residents of Mobile, and the seizure was made within five days, during which a lien is allowed by a similar statute of Louisiana. Tyree v. Sands, 24 La. Ann. 363. The decision is upon the ground that the recognition of the privilege did not violate any priority established by the law of the forum, but, on the contrary, was in harmony with such law; that it did not injure the rights of the citizens of the forum, for no such rights were involved; and, finally, it did not infringe the rule that the remedy must, in all cases, be in accordance with the law of the forum, for that law allowed the process adopted by the vendor in the case at bar.

The Arkansas statute providing that, in an action to recover the purchase money for a chattel, the debtor shall not be allowed to claim the specific chattel he has purchased but never paid for as exempt from seizure and sale, but the vendor may obtain an order of sequestration, applies to an action in Arkansas for the purchase price of property which was sold upon credit in another state, but subsequently removed to Arkansas. Swanger v. Goodwin, 49 Ark. 287, 5 S. W. 319. The decision is upon the ground that the effect of the law was not to give the vendor a lien, but merely a remedy.

d. Conditional sale.

As to rights and obligations of immediate parties under conditional contract, see Gross v. Jordan, 83 Me. 380, 22 Atl. 250, and Public Parks Amusement Co. v. Embree-McLean Carriage Co. 64 Ark. 29, 40 S. W. 582, III. a, supra. Where notes for the purchase price of machinery, and a deed providing, in effect, that the property shall remain the property of the vendors until the notes are paid, were dated in Massachusetts, but were delivered in Maine, the property being in the latter state, the validity of the reservation of the title will be determined by the law of Maine, and the law of that state, requiring such agreement to be recorded in order to be effectual as against creditors of the purchaser, will be applied. Holt v. Knowlton, 86 Me. 456, 29 Atl. 1113.

A statute of Georgia, providing that cotton sold on cash sale shall not be considered as the property of the buyer, or the ownership given up until the same shall be fully paid for, although it may have been delivered into the possession of the buyer, does not protect the vendor in such a sale made in Georgia against a subsequent bona fide purchaser from the vendee in New York. Comer v. Cunningham, 77 N. Y. 391, 33 Am. Rep. 626. The decision is upon the ground that, assuming that the Georgia statute entered into the original contract of sale, its only effect would be to place the parties in the same position as if it had been stipulated at the time of the delivery that such delivery should be conditional upon payment, and the law of New York, which protects a bona fide purchaser from one to whom goods have been conditionally delivered, must be applied. The court distinguished between a sale with conditional delivery and a conditional sale.

The court, in Marvin Safe Co. v. Norton, 48 N. J. L. 410, 57 Am. Rep. 566, 7 Atl. 418, takes the position that the validity of a conditional contract of sale with reservation of title in the vendor, as between the parties, is to be determined by the law of the place where the contract was made and the property was then located, notwithstanding that the property was subsequently removed to another state; and it was assumed that such law would also determine the rights of a third person, so far as they depended upon its validity or invalidity as between the parties; but, assuming its validity, according to that law, as between the parties, its validity as against a third person who deals with the property after its removal to another state, upon faith of the vendee's possession and apparent title and without notice of the reservation, is to be determined by the law of the latter state. It was accordingly held in that case that the law of Pennsylvania, by which the reservation of title upon a conditional sale of chattels is valid as between the parties, but invalid as to third persons, governs, so far as the immediate parties are concerned, a contract made in that state for the sale of property then in that state, to be delivered therein to the purchaser; but the law of New Jersey, by which such a reservation of title is valid, even as against third persons, governs when the property is removed to New Jersey, and resold by the purchaser to a third person without notice of the reservation.

The law of New Jersey, by which a conditional sale of chattels is valid without registration, even as against a subsequent bona fide purchaser from the vendee, rather than the law of New York, which requires such a contract to be recorded, governs where a contract was made in New York between residents of New Jersey for the conditional sale of property, part of which was then in New York, but which was to be delivered in New Jersey, and to be paid for in that state, it being subsequently purchased from the vendee in the latter state. Flske v. Peebles, 13 N. Y. S. R. 743.

And, conversely, it was held in Torrance v. Third Nat. Bank, 70 Hun, 44, 23 N. Y. Supp. 1073, that the law of Pennsylvania, by which such a reservation of title is invalid as against creditors of, or bona fide purchasers from, the vendee, governed where the conditional contract was made in New York for the sale of a safe to be shipped to Pennsylvania, and the safe was subsequently purchased in the latter state under an execution against the vendee.

The case next cited, however, seems to refer the question to the law of the state where the contract was made, though that was also the state in which the transaction upon which the mortgagee based his claims as against the vendor took place.

The question in Buzzell v. Cummings, 61 Vt. 213, 18 Atl. 93, was between a vendor of chattels under a verbal agreement reserving the title until payment of the purchase price, and a mortgagee of real property in New Hampshire, who claimed that the chattels had become fixtures. The court said that, as the lien contract was made in New Hampshire, the laws and decisions of that state must control the case. It appeared in this case that the bargain for the personal property was made in Vermont, and the justification for the statement that the lien contract was made in New Hampshire is not apparent, unless New Hampshire was regarded as the place of that contract upon the theory that the contract was consummated by the delivery of the property in New Hampshire.

There is considerable conflict among the cases whether it is necessary, in order to protect the vendor under a reservation of title which was valid by the law of the state where the contract was made and where the property was then situated, to file or record the contract, or take the other steps required by the local law of another state into which the property is removed by the vendee. The weight of authority, however, seems to hold, in accord with the rule with reference to chattel mortgages (see note to Snider v. Yates, ante, 353), that, unless the local law of the state into which the property is removed with reference to filing or recording conditional contracts of sale, expressly applies to contracts made out of the state with reference to property subsequently brought into the state, compliance therewith is unnecessary in order to protect the vendors after the removal of the property, unless it was contemplated at the time of the sale that the property would be removed to the state.

A contract of conditional sale of chattels in Kansas, made between residents of that state and valid by the law thereof, reserving title in the vendor until payment of the purchase price, may be enforced in Colorado after the property is brought there, although the requirements of the latter state with reference to such contracts were not complied with. Harper v. People, 2 Colo. App. 177, 29 Pac. 1040. There was no averment in this case that the vendor knew that the property was to be brought into Colorado; but the court lays down the principle without reference to the knowledge of the parties in that respect. The action was by the vendor for conversion against an officer who took the property from his possession after he had taken it from the possession of the vendee as permitted by the contract. The decision, however, would clearly have been the same if the officer had seized it while still in possession of the vendee.

Warnken v. Langdon Mercantile Co. 8 N. D. 243, 77 N. W. 1000, apparently assumed that the validity and effect of the reservation of title, in a conditional sale of personal property made in Manitoba, were to be determined by the law of Manitoba, even as against a person who took a mortgage upon the property after the vendee had, without consent of the vendor, taken it to North Dakota, though so far as appears, there was no registration of the mortgage either in Manitoba or in North Dakota.

The vendor in a conditional sale of a piano, which was valid by the law of the state in which it was made, even as against a subsequent bona fide purchaser, though not recorded, may recover the same from one who purchased it in good faith from the vendee after the latter, without the knowledge or consent of the vendor, had removed it to Kansas, although it was not registered in the latter state as provided by the Kansas statute with reference to conditional sales generally. Baldwin v. Hill, 4 Kan. App. 168, 46 Pac. 329.

The reservation of the title until payment of the purchase price in a contract of sale made in Vermont by a citizen of that state to a citizen of Maine, being valid by the law of the former state without the recording of the contract, is valid in Maine, and protects the property against attachment in that state by a creditor of the purchaser; and the Maine statute, requiring such contracts to be recorded in order to protect the seller as against creditors of the purchasers, does not apply. Drew v. Smith, 59 Me. 393.

The New Jersey statute, requiring instruments attesting conditional sales to be recorded in the county where the party contracting to buy, if a resident of the state, shall reside at the time of the execution thereof, and, if not a resident of the state, then in the county where the property bought shall be at the time of the execution of the instrument,—does not apply where the vendee did not reside in the state at the time of the sale, and the property was not then within the state, though it was subsequently removed thereto by the vendee without the vendor's knowledge. Woolley v. Geneva Wagon Co. 59 N. J. L. 278, 35 Atl. 789. It was assumed in this case that the vendor would be protected without recording the instrument in New Jersey.

Cooper v. Philadelphia Worsted Co. (N. J. Eq.) 57 Atl. 733, however, held that the foregoing statute applied to a purchase by a New Jersey corporation of personal property which, at the time, was in another state, but was subsequently removed to New Jersey, though such removal was not contemplated at the time of the purchase.

A conditional sale of chattels valid in the state in which it is made, as against creditors of the purchaser, is valid as against creditors attaching the property in New Hampshire, although it is not recorded in the latter state as required by the statute with reference to conditional sales executed within the state, and although it was contemplated at the time of the sale that the property would be taken to New Hampshire. Cleveland Mach. Works v. Lang, 87 N. H. 348, 68 Am. St. Rep. 675, 31 Atl. 20.

The lien of a conditional vendor valid within Massachusetts, where the contract was made and the goods were delivered, is not invalidated, nor the property subjected to attachment by creditors of the vendee, by subsequent removal of the property to New Hampshire, and the failure to comply with the formalities of oath and record required by the New Hampshire statute. Dorntee Casket Co. v. Cunnison, 69 N. H. 297, 45 Atl. 318.

The requirement of the Wisconsin statute, that a conditional sale of personal property shall be filed in the town where the vendee resides, or, if a nonresident, in the county where the property may be at the time of the making of the contract, does not apply to a sale made in New York between residents of that state, of property at the time in transit from England to Wisconsin. Mershon v. Moors, 78 Wis. 502, 45 N. W. 95.

Where an order for a safe, stipulating that the title shall remain in the vendor until payment of the purchase price, is given in Vermont by a resident of that state, to an agent of a safe dealer doing business in Massachusetts subject to the approval of the principal, who accepts the order and ships the safe by freight to the purchaser in Vermont, the sale is a Massachusetts contract, and the reservation of the title, being valid by the law of Massachusetts, will protect the vendor as against an assignee in insolvency of the purchaser, although, by the laws of Vermont, it would be otherwise. Bartlett v. Kelley, 66 Vt. 515, 44 Am. St. Rep. 862, 29 Atl. 804.

The Nova Scotia act requiring recording of contracts for conditional sales does not apply to machinery bought in Ontario, the title to remain in the seller, although intended for use in a factory in Nova Scotia. McGregor v. Kerr, 29 N. S. 45.

The New Jersey statute, requiring conditional contracts of sale to be recorded, does not apply to a contract made between nonresidents concerning personal property situated out of the state, the contract not contemplating the removal of the property into New Jersey. Hirsch v. C. W. Leatherbee Lumber Co. (N. J. L.) 53 Atl. 645. This was an action by the seller against the purchaser for conversion, and neither the action nor defense was based upon anything that occurred while the property was in New Jersey.

In Ensley Lumber Co. v. Lewis, 121 Ala. 94, 25 So. 729, the court said that it may be that a conditional sale of personal property, entered into in Alabama, would not be good as between an original seller and an innocent purchaser for value without notice in Georgia, to which the property is subsequently taken, but that that would be the case only when the rights are to be determined in Georgia courts. Continuing, the court said that it knew of no rule of comity between states that would give to the registration laws of Georgia an extraterritorial force, operative on contracts executed within, and with a view to being enforced in, Alabama, when rights growing out of such contracts are sought to be enforced in the courts of Alabama.

Emerson Co. v. Proctor, 97 Me. 360, 54 Atl. 849, also assumes that it is not necessary to record the contract in the state to which the property is removed, if the contract of sale was completed in another state where the property was then located, although in this case the law of Maine requiring conditional contracts to be recorded was applied, notwithstanding that, at the time of the sale, the property was in Maryland. The decision, however, was upon the ground that the sale, which was of specific property, was completed in Maine by the act of the purchaser in depositing in the mail in that state a letter directed to the vendor in Maryland, definitely and unconditionally accepting the latter's proposition to sell. It will be observed that that act completed the executed, as well as the executory, contract, since the property was already identified, and delivery was, therefore, not essential to the consummation of the executed contract.

It will be observed that the rule supported by the foregoing cases does not apply when the contract, which is made in one state, contemplates the delivery of the property in another. Thus:

A state statute requiring conditional sales of personal property to be recorded applies to a contract of sale, made in another state, of property to be delivered and held within the former state. Knowles Loom Works v. Vacher, 57 N. J. L. 490, 33 L. R. A. 805, 31 Atl. 306.

Where a conditional contract of sale is made in Rhode Island, where the vendor was domiciled, but provides for the delivery of the chattels, and contemplates their use, in another state, it is governed by the law of the latter state with respect to the necessity of recording the same in order to protect the vendor against the creditors of the vendee. Re Legg, 96 Fed. 326.

In Alabama the statute with reference to the registration of conditional contracts expressly requires that, when property is brought into the state while subject to the condition, the contract must be recorded within three months thereafter. It was held in Brandon Printing Co. v. Bostick, 126 Ala. 247, 28 So. 705, that a contract made within this provision, rather than the provision applicable to contracts made within the state with reference to the property therein, where the contract of sale was made in Tennessee, and the property was, pursuant to the purchaser's request, delivered to a carrier in that state consigned to the purchaser in Alabama.

It will be observed that the rule was applied in Cleveland Mach. Works v. Lang, 87 N. H. 348, 68 Am. St. Rep. 675, 31 Atl. 20, notwithstanding that it was contemplated, at the time the contract was made, that the property was to be removed to New Hampshire. This extension of the rule, however, is open to question.

In Hervey v. Rhode Island Locomotive Works, 93 U. S. 664, 23 L. ed. 1003, it was held, upon the authority of Green v. Van Buskirk, 7 Wall. 139, 19 L. ed. 109, that the reservation of title in a conditional contract of sale, made in another state between nonresidents, would not protect the vendor against seizure of the property under process against the vendee after its removal to Illinois, unless recorded in that state as required by its law. This decision upon its face would seem to involve a repudiation in toto of the rule supported by the cases above cited; but, when it is examined in connection with the facts of the case, it appears merely to make an exception to the rule when the removal of the property to the state was contemplated by the parties at the time of the contract. The decision is put upon the ground that the policy of the law of Illinois requires that the real owner of personal property, creating an interest in another, to whom it is delivered, if desirous of preserving a lien on it, shall comply with the requirements of the chattel-mortgage act of Illinois. So far as appears, however, while the public policy of Illinois requires instruments creating such liens to be filed in the state if the property was within the state when the instrument was executed, though executed in another state, it does not require such an instrument to be filed in the state, when the property was not in the state at that time, but was subsequently brought therein,—at least unless it was contemplated at the time that it should be brought into the state. This distinction was expressly alluded to in Green v. Van Buskirk. (See discussion of the latter case, and of Illinois cases on the subject, in note to Snider v. Yates, ante, 353, 363.) The report of the case in Hervey v. Rhode Island Locomotive Works, 93 U. S. 664, 23 L. ed. 1003, shows an express finding of fact that the vendor delivered the property (apparently in Rhode Island or New York) to be used in Illinois. For the reasons stated, this fact seems to be a qualification of the decision, though it is not expressly recognized as such in the opinion.

In Beggs v. Bartels, 73 Conn. 132, 84 Am. St. Rep. 152, 46 Atl. 874, where a conditional sale of a boiler and machinery, which provided that they were to be used in a factory in Connecticut, was made in New York, the goods being delivered to the purchaser upon the cars in the latter state, it was held that the validity of the reservation of the title, as against creditors of the purchaser who attached the property after its removal to Connecticut, was to be determined by the law of the latter state; and it was accordingly held that the reservation was not valid as against the attachments, the contract not having been acknowledged before competent authority as required by the Connecticut statute, although it was valid as against third persons according to the law of New York. The decision is upon the ground that the law of the place of performance prevails over the law of the place where a contract is made, and that the portion of the contract with reference to the reservation of the title was performable in Connecticut. The court said that it need not be determined whether the rights of the attaching creditors might not also be sustained upon considerations of public policy.

The converse of the rule stated at the beginning of the subdivision, i. e., that the failure to comply with the law of the state where the contract was made and the property then located will defeat the reservation, even as against a third person who deals with the property after its removal to another state, is not so well supported as the rule itself, though it seems to have been held in the case next cited.

The lien of a conditional vendor is not enforceable in New Hampshire as against a subsequent mortgagee of the vendee, where the contract was not recorded in the state where it was made and where the property was then situated, as required by the law of that state in order to make it valid as against third persons dealing with the vendee. Davis v. Osgood, 69 N. H. 427, 44 Atl. 432. It does not expressly appear that the property had been removed to New Hampshire before the execution of the mortgage, but that was apparently the fact; and it would also seem that the sale had been recorded in New Hampshire, for the court said that the provisions of the New Hampshire statute respecting the record of conditional sales apply only to sales made within the state.

In Weinstein v. Freyer, 93 Ala. 257, 12 L. R. A. 700, 9 So. 285, however, it was held that the law of Georgia, by which a conditional contract of sale is not valid against a subsequent purchaser from the vendee without notice unless recorded, does not apply where the original contract of sale was made in Georgia between parties there domiciled, the property being also in that state at the time, if it was subsequently brought to Alabama by the vendee, and there sold to a third person. The court said that the law of Alabama, by which the reservation of property is good, even as against a purchaser without notice, applied.

So, the requirement of the statute of another state, that an instrument which reserves the title to personal property to the vendor until payment of the purchase price must be recorded to make the reservation valid as against third persons, has no operation or effect in Arkansas; and the title of the original vendor in such a conditional sale prevails over that of a third person who purchases the property from the original purchaser after its removal into Arkansas, although the instrument reserving title was not recorded. Public Parks Amusement Co. v. Embree-McLean Carriage Co. 64 Ark. 29, 40 S. W. 582.

Some of the cases, however, hold, without qualification, that filing or recording in the state to which the property is removed is necessary in order to protect the vendor under his reservation as against subsequent purchasers from, or creditors of, the vendee. Thus:

Where personal property is brought into Georgia, the requirements which the Georgia law imposes for the benefit of third persons as to the attestation and recording of contracts, by which the title to the property is reserved to the vendor, are not dispensed with by the fact that it was purchased, and is to be paid for, in another state. Cunningham v. Cureton, 96 Ga. 489, 23 S. E. 420.

A contract of conditional purchase and sale of property, by which the title of the vendor is retained until the payment of the purchase price, made and to be performed in a state in which a public record of the agreement is not required, may not be enforced as against a purchaser in good faith and for value of the property in another state to which it has been removed, and in which the contract has not been recorded, as required by the statutes of that state, although the removal was without the knowledge of the vendor, when there was no stipulation in the contract against removal of the property from the state in which the sale was made. Sanger v. Jesse French Piano & Organ Co. 21 Tex. Civ. App. 523, 52 S. W. 621.

The rights of one who purchases personal property then in Kentucky from a person to whom it had been previously sold in Ohio under a contract reserving title until payment of the purchase price is to be determined by the law of Kentucky, rather than the law of Ohio. Hart v. Barney & S. Mfg. Co. 7 Fed. 543. A statute of Kentucky, requiring conditional contracts of sale to be registered in order to be valid as against creditors of the vendee, was accordingly applied.

Whether an instrument executed in New York, under which an engine was furnished to a steam lighter, with a reservation of the title until the payment of the purchase price, is a mere conditional sale of the property, or is "a conveyance intended to operate as a mortgage" within the New Jersey statute requiring such conveyances to be recorded, is to be determined by the law of New Jersey, rather than the law of New York, where the lighter afterwards goes to New Jersey, and an attempt is made by creditors to attach the engine there. The Marina, 19 Fed. 760.

Dixon v. Blondin, 58 Vt. 689, 5 Atl. 514, held that parol evidence was not admissible in a suit between a vendor and an attaching creditor of the vendee to prove that the sale was conditional, where it was evidenced by a writing importing an absolute sale, in reliance upon which the attachment was made, notwithstanding that the contract was made in New Hampshire, by the law of which a conditional sale, not evidenced by a writing, is valid. It was held, however, that the vendor's title under a verbal conditional sale made in New Hampshire will be protected if he has done nothing by which he is estopped. G. H. P.

ERROR to the Supreme Court to review a judgment in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to oust defendant from possession of a public street in front of plaintiffs' property. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. H. Gaskill, for plaintiff in error:

Ejectment is not the proper remedy to recover possession where the property alleged to be invaded consists of a public street.

Defendants in error cannot maintain their action of ejectment in the present instance, for the reason that there has been no disseisin or ouster.

A steam surface railroad cannot be placed upon a public highway without compensation to the owner of the fee. This is based on the ground that a steam railroad is an exclusive use of the highway, and destroys the utility for ordinary vehicles.

Hendrickson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This writ brings up for review a judgment of the supreme court entered upon a postea from the Camden circuit. The action is ejectment, and was brought by the plaintiffs, abutting owners on that part of Front street, in the city of Camden, between Clinton street and Kaighns avenue, in order to secure the removal of the track and road-bed of the defendant, laid down by it in front of plaintiffs' premises for steam railway purposes. The use of the track was limited to the operation of freight cars thereon. A verdict for the plaintiffs of 6 cents damages was directed by the learned trial judge. A request of the defendant for an instruction to the jury that no recovery could be had for the premises described in the declaration was refused. To these rulings exceptions were taken by the defendant, and sealed, and error has been duly assigned thereon.

The premises embraced in the suit was the strip of land between the center line of the street and the plaintiffs' property line, containing the track and roadbed of the defendant, having a length of about 37 feet and a width of 2½ feet from the center line, subject to the public easement to and over said land.

The first ground urged in support of these assignments of error is that ejectment will not lie to recover possession of a portion of a public street; actual possession being inconsistent with the public easement, and constituting a nuisance, which would render the plaintiffs liable to indictment. The defendant cites as authority for this doctrine Oincinnati v. White, 6 Pet. 431, 8 L. ed. 452; Stiles v. Curtis, 4 Day, 328. But the authority of the former case would be more persuasive if the point here referred to and there discussed had been necessary to the decision. For it will be remembered that the case was determined against the plaintiff in his suit to recover a plot of ground contained in what was known as a "city common," on the ground that it had been dedicated to public use by a previous grantor in the plaintiff's chain of title. But the law upon the subject now under discussion has so long been settled in this state against the contention of the defendant that it would seem to be now too late to question it. In 1858 a suit of ejectment was brought by the owner of the fee in a turnpike road, which carried with it the public easement of the highway, against a defendant who was the tenant of a tollhouse built upon part of the highway. Other questions were involved, but Chief Justice Green, in delivering the opinion of the supreme court, said: "It is admitted that ejectment will lie by the owner of the soil for a part of the highway illegally appropriated by a third party to his own use. So the law is settled." The case went to this court afterwards, and there was a reversal, but no opinion was filed. No question was raised, however, as to the propriety of the form of action, and the ejectment suit prevailed. See State v. Laverack, 34 N. J. L. 201; Burnet v. Crane, 56 N. J. L. 235, 44 Am. St. Rep. 395, 28 Atl. 591. In the latter case this court held that ejectment was an appropriate remedy for the owner of the fee against one who, having a right of way over the locus in quo, extended his fence and took exclusive possession thereof. In French v. Robb, 67 N. J. L. 260, 57 64 L. R. A.

L. R. A. 956, 91 Am. St. Rep. 433, 51 Atl. 509, the abutting owner brought ejectment, to remove an electric-light pole in the public street, used for private lighting. This court held in that case that the owner of the soil in a street may maintain ejectment against any person wrongfully taking or claiming exclusive possession of the same. This doctrine is supported by the great weight of authority elsewhere. It was fully sustained in the early English case of Goodtitle ex dem. Chester v. Alker, 1 Burr. 143, 1 Ld. Kenyon, 427. One of the questions was whether an ejectment will lie by the owner of the soil for land which is subject to passage over it as a King's highway, and the opinion recited that 1 Rolle, Abr. 392, letter b, pl. 1, 2, is express "that the King has nothing but the passage for himself and his people, but the freehold and all the profits belong to the owner of the soil." Lord Mansfield, speaking for the court, said, among other things: "There is no reason why he [the owner] should not have a right to all remedies for the freehold, subject still, indeed, to the servitude or easement." The legal writers and the judicial decisions are found to be generally in accord with the doctrine here stated. In Newell on Ejectment (1892), p. 31, the rule is stated thus: "It is a well-settled rule of law that the owner of the land subject to an easement, servitude, or public use may recover the possession of land in an action of ejectment against a person wrongfully appropriating the same to a purpose wholly foreign to the easement or servitude. The rule applies to the public highways . . . and the like, but in the action the land is recovered subject to the easement or servitude." The rule is similarly stated in 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 473, and the cases in support of the doctrine are fully collated there and in 17 Century Digest, 1978.

It is further contended by the plaintiff in error that, granting the doctrine to be as stated, the occupancy of the street in this case was not exclusive or inconsistent with the public use, according to the meaning of the rule; that in fact the space between the rails was planked so as to admit the use of the highway by the public, except as to the small strip in the center of the street when the cars were actually running. But the answer to this is that such a use is an additional burden to the highway, and, unless supported by legislative authority, it does wrongfully appropriate a portion of the highway to a purpose foreign to the easement. In Burlington v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 56 N. J. Eq. 259, 38 Atl. 849, Affirmed in 58 N. J. Eq. 547, 43 Atl. 700, it was declared that a steam railroad laid longitudinally in a street is regarded as practically an exclusive appropriation of that part of the street which it occupies to a use inconsistent with the legitimate use of the street by the public. And in Louisville, St. L. & T. R. Co. v. Liebfried, 92 Ky. 407, 17 S. W. 870, it was held that, in a suit by the abutting owner, ejectionment would lie against a railroad company appropriating the same to its permanent use without legislative grant, express or implied.

It is not contended that there was any error in the refusal to admit in evidence the city ordinance empowering the defendant to construct and operate the branch railroad in question. Such an ordinance would not be admissible in the absence of any legislative grant to support the ordinance.

Under the evidence the plaintiff was entitled to a direction of the verdict in his favor, and hence there was no error in the rulings of the trial judge.

The same result is reached in No. 20, George Rathacker v. Same Defendants, and in No. 21, Philip Wilson v. Same; the three cases, involving the same questions, having been argued together.

The judgment in each of these cases is affirmed, with costs.

v.

SUPREME LODGE KNIGHTS OF PYTHIAS, Appt.

(.....N. Y.)

1. A physician called by a stranger to furnish aid to one who has attempted suicide, and who is compelled to render his services against the will and opposition of the patient, is within the provision of the statute prohibiting a physician from testifying to facts learned while attending a patient in a professional capacity.
2. The contract contained in a mutual benefit certificate, which requires the beneficiary to sign an acceptance of its provisions, is made where the contract is consummated by such acceptance, and subject to the laws there in force.
3. A provision in a mutual benefit certificate by which the beneficiary waives the benefit of any statutory provisions prohibiting physicians from disclosing information acquired in attendance upon patients does not meet the requirement of the statute that such waiver, in case of a deceased person, must be by his personal representatives in order to render the evidence admissible.

APPPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Second Department, affirming a judgment of a Special Term for Kings County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to NOTE.—For a case in this series somewhat similar to the one above, holding, however, that a physician may testify as to facts learned in examining a prisoner against his will, see State v. Height, 59 L. R. A. 437.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Messrs. Laurence G. Goodhart and Carlos H. Hardy, for appellant:

The last act which changed the offer of Meyer into a contract between him and the defendant—that is, the acceptance of the offer—was the issuance of the certificate.

The acceptance which made up a contract took place within the jurisdiction of the state of Illinois. It is, therefore, an Illinois contract, and the lex loci celebrationis applies.

Vann, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The deceased was in extremis, incapable of acting or deciding for himself, and, from the necessity of the case, anyone was authorized to call a physician to treat him. Without the knowledge or consent of the dying man, Dr. Bruso was called for that purpose, and for that purpose alone he attended. He found Mr. Meyer, the deceased, in bed in an upper room of a hotel, "suffering intense pain and vomiting." Meyer told him to get out of the room,—that he did not want him there,—but he did not leave. He remained to treat him as a physician, and, in order to treat him intelligently, tried to find out what the matter was. He learned from Meyer, partly in answer to questions, and partly through voluntary disclosures, that he had taken a preparation of arsenic, known as "rough on rats," "because he wanted to die." From this information, and from observation of the physical symptoms, he decided that Meyer was suffering from arsenical poisoning. Thus informed as to the nature of the disease, he at once administered a remedy, and soon followed it by another. The helpless man, without friends to aid or advise, hopeless of life and court-ting death, objected, and tried to curse him away from his bedside. The doctor, loyal to the instincts of his profession, refused to listen to the ravings of the would-be suicide, and continued to prescribe in order to relieve suffering and prolong life. Upon the trial he was not allowed to disclose the information acquired under these circumstances, and we are now to determine whether there was enough evidence to warrant the trial judge in deciding, as a preliminary question of fact, that such information was acquired "in attending a patient in a professional capacity," and that it "was necessary to enable him to act in that capacity." Code Civ. Proc. § 834; Griffiths v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 171 N. Y. 106, 111, 63 N. E., 808.

The learned doctor was called as physician, he attended as a physician, he made a diagnosis as a physician, and he administered remedies as a physician. In all that he did, he acted in a professional capacity. While it is true that in all he did he acted against the will and in spite of the remonstrance of a man whose condition imperatively called for professional treatment, still the meeting was professional in nature, and all that he said or did was strictly in the line of his profession. Was the subject any the less a patient, within the meaning and object of the statute, because he was forced to submit to ministrations designed to save his life? Was the doctor guilty of assault when he gave the hypodermic injection? Was he bound to leave him there to die, without an effort to help him? Was the statute designed to protect those only who are treated by consent, but not those treated through necessity? Does it not mean by a "patient" at least one who is consciously treated by a physician, even without his consent, when the facts tend to show that through bodily suffering his mind had partially lost its hold? Do our humane laws make it the duty of a physician to leave the bedside of a dying man, because he demands it, and, if he remains and relieves him by physical touch, hold him guilty of assault? Either Dr. Brusco was the physician of Mr. Meyer, or he committed an assault upon him, and was guilty of a crime. If the wife of the deceased had called the doctor, she would have acted as an agent by implied authority. The bell boy who in fact called him also acted upon implied authority, and, when the doctor came, the act of the agent in calling him, if subject to revocation in the actual case, would have been in the supposed case. While the doctor in either case could have retired, if he remained in either he remained as a physician, the sick man became his patient, and he was acting in a professional capacity when, as a duly licensed physician, he actually treated Mr. Meyer as a patient. When one who is sick unto death is in fact treated by a physician as a patient, even against his will, he becomes the patient of that physician, by operation of law. The same is true of one who is unconscious and unable to speak for himself. If the deceased had been in a comatose state when the physician arrived, the existence of the professional relation could not be questioned. The relation of physician and patient, so far as the statute under consideration is concerned, springs from the fact of professional treatment, independent of the causes which led to such treatment. An examination made in order to prescribe establishes the same relation. I am of opinion that Dr. Brusco, who treated the deceased at the hotel, occupied the same confidential relation to him as did the physicians at the hospital. The fact that the patient told the doctor several times to let him alone, as he wished to die, expressing himself in a brutal and profane manner, does not, in my judgment, negative the existence of the relation of physician and patient. As was said by Judge Earl in Renihan v. Dennin, 103 N. Y. 573, 578, 57 Am. Rep. 770, 9 N. E. 320, 321: "Dr. Bontecou was a person duly authorized to practise physic. Whatever information he had about the condition of the testator he acquired while attending him as a patient. It is true that the testator did not call him or procure his attendance, but he did not thrust himself into his presence or intrude there. He was called by the attending physician, and went in his professional capacity to see the patient, and that was enough to bring the case within the statute. It is quite common for physicians to be summoned by the friends of the patient, or even by strangers about him; and the statute would be robbed of much of its virtue if a physician thus called were to be excluded from its provisions because . . . he was not employed by the patient, nor a contract relation created between him and the patient. To bring the case within the statute, it is sufficient that the person attended as a physician upon the patient, and obtained his information in that capacity." So, in People v. Murphy, 101 N. Y. 126, 54 Am. Rep. 661, 4 N. E. 326, it was held that the fact that the physician was selected and sent by the district attorney to attend the patient after the commission of a crime against her person did not affect the question.

When a physician is sent by a prosecuting officer to make a report upon the sanity of a prisoner, if he does not treat or prescribe for the subject, the statements of the latter are not protected. People v. Sliney, 137 N. Y. 570, 33 N. E. 150. But even though a physician is sent for the sole purpose of examining as to sanity, if he prescribes for the prisoner during the visit, the relation of physician and patient is thereby created, and the disclosures made are within the statute. People v. Stout, 3 Park. Crim. Rep. 670; Weitz v. Mound City R. Co. 53 Mo. App. 39; Freel v. Market Street Cable R. Co. 97 Cal. 40, 31 Pac. 730; Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. v. Cummings, 8 Colo. App. 541, 46 Pac. 875. See also Grossman v. Supreme Lodge, K. & L. of H. 25 N. Y. S. R. 843, 6 N. Y. Supp. 821; Grattan v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 24 Hun, 43; Edington v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 67 N. Y. 185. The fact of treatment is the decisive test in this case. Meyer was treated by the witness as a physician, and answered his questions, knowing that he was a physician, and that he was about to prescribe for him against his will. As was well said by the learned judges of the appellate division: "The language [of the statute] is broad enough to cover cases of medical attendance, whether such attendance results from the voluntary call of the patient upon a physician, or from the exigencies of the patient's situation. If the relation is that of a physician attending a patient in a professional capacity, no matter how the relation was brought about, the

In Griffiths v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 171 N. Y. 106, 63 N. E. 808, relied upon by the appellant, there was no evidence that the physician acted in a professional capacity, or even that the supposed patient knew he was a physician. The doctor in that case testified that at the time he acquired the information he did not "treat him, in any sense, as a physician;" that his conversation with him did not relate to his physical condition, but was confined "to the method of the accident, and that whatever he said was entirely distinct from any treatment or visit of a physician, or anything of that sort;" that, while he had rendered "first aid" to the plaintiff in a drug store immediately after the accident, when no statement was made, "he did not think that the plaintiff knew that he was the physician who treated him at the drug store; and that he did not advise him of the fact until after the plaintiff had given him a statement." Judge Werner, writing for this court, said: "Here there are no facts shown which would warrant the presumption that the relation of physician and patient existed, or that would justify the conclusion that the conversation which the doctor was about to give had any relation to professional treatment."

I think that the statute impresses absolute secrecy upon all knowledge acquired by a physician in a sickroom that is necessary to enable him to properly treat the sick person, whether the treatment be with or without his consent. While I agree with Judge Gray in his conclusion as to the first question considered by him, I differ as to the last, and, for the reasons stated, vote in favor of affirmance, with costs.

O'Brien, Bartlett, and Martin, JJ., concur.

Gray, J., dissenting:

The action was brought to recover against the defendant, a fraternal, mutual benefit corporation, organized under the acts of the Congress of the United States, upon a certificate of membership issued to Emanuel Meyer, by which it promised to pay, upon his death, to his wife, this plaintiff, the sum of $2,000. The defendant alleged in defense of the action that the death of Meyer was the result of suicide, which, within the terms of the agreement of the parties, avoided the certificate. Upon the trial of the issues, the defendant, claiming the affirmative, and not questioning plaintiff's preliminary proofs to establish a case under the allegations of her complaint, was allowed to begin with its defense, and its evidence as directed towards proving that the beneficiary committed suicide by taking poison. The trial judge submitted to the jury the one question "whether the deceased committed suicide," and, upon their answering "No" to the question, he directed judgment to be entered for the plaintiff. That judgment has been affirmed by the appellate division, and upon this appeal, in substance, the general argument of the appellant is that the waiver of the deceased, contained in his application for the insurance certificate, of all provisions of law then or thereafter in force prohibiting any physician from testifying to any information acquired by attendance upon him, was a part of a contract, which had been validly made in the state of Illinois, and that §§ 834 and 836 of the Code of Civil Procedure of this state, under which such testimony is rendered inadmissible unless the statutory prohibition is waived upon the trial by the personal representatives of the deceased, are inoperative, as being in violation of the provisions of the Federal Constitution which prohibit legislation in impairment of contracts. The argument, further, is that, as to one of the physicians called upon to testify for the defense, his testimony, certainly, did not come within the statutory prohibition, inasmuch as the necessary relationship of physician and patient did not exist.

With respect to the first of these questions raised by the appellant, whatever other answers might be made to the applicability of the provision of the Federal Constitution relied upon, it is sufficient to say now that this contract was consummated in the state of New York, and is to be governed, in its enforcement, by the laws of that state. The beneficiary was a resident of this state, and there made his application for the insurance. The certificate issuing upon the application appears, from its language only, to have been signed by the officers of the defendant at Chicago, in the state of Illinois, on September 20, 1894; but upon it was printed the following clause: "I hereby accept this certificate of membership subject to all the conditions therein contained." And that had the signature of the applicant, followed by the words, "Dated at New York, this 28th day of September, 1894, attest: Louis Riegel, Secretary Section 2179, Endowment Rank, K. of P." By the terms of the certificate, the agreement of the defendant was subject, not only to the conditions subscribed to by the member in his application, but "to the further conditions and agreements hereinafter named;" and the clause containing his acceptance, above quoted, was one of those "further agreements." From these terms of the agreements of the parties, the only natural conclusion is that the place of the contract was where it was intended and understood to be consummated. Its completion depended upon the execution by the member of the further agreement indorsed upon the certificate, namely, to accept it "subject to all the conditions therein contained." The contract was not completed, in the sense that it was binding upon either party to it, until it was delivered in New York after the execution by the member of the further agreement expressing his unqualified acceptance of its conditions. As matter of fact, the promise of the defendant was to pay the insurance moneys to the plaintiff, who resided in New York,—a feature giving additional local coloring to the contract. But the sufficient and controlling fact is that by its terms it was first to take effect as a binding obligation when the required agreement on the part of the member was executed by him.

The difficulty in this case, which, in my judgment, entitles the defendant to a new trial in the action, is the exclusion of the evidence of Dr. Brusco, called as a witness for the defendant, and asked to state a conversation had with Meyer, the deceased. This witness was a physician, having his office in the city of Buffalo, in this state, near the Iroquois hotel. He testified that, in the early morning, one of the bell boys of the hotel came for him, and, upon entering one of the rooms, he found a man in the bed, suffering from pain and vomiting. Objection being made to his evidence, which was in the form of a deposition, the court put the question: "Did this doctor treat him?" The defendant's counsel replied: "He inserted something hypodermically into the man against his wish." The objection to the testimony was sustained, the defendant excepted, and the whole deposition of the witness was excluded, under the previous ruling of the court that §§ 834 and 836 of the Code of Civil Procedure applied. From the deposition thus offered and excluded, it appeared that the witness had a conversation with Meyer, which was narrated, so far as material, as follows: "I asked him what he had been doing, and he told me it was none of my damned business; that he didn't want me in there, and he wanted me to get out of there. . . . I looked around the room. . . . I found . . . a box of rough on rats . . . empty. . . . He told me he had taken it . . . because he wanted to die; . . . he didn't want to get well; . . . he didn't want me to do anything. . . . I prepared a hypodermic injection, . . . and stimulated him, so he would not die in the Hotel Iroquois. . . . When I was going to give him the hypodermic, he said: 'You [cursing him in foul language] keep away from here. Didn't I tell you before to keep away?' I paid no attention to him, and gave him the hypodermic." The witness was then asked if he knew what was the cause of the condition of the man, and he answered that it was arsenical poisoning, and that the symptoms evidenced it. The deceased was immediately conveyed from the hotel to the hospital, where he died soon afterwards. The evidence of Dr. Brusco was deemed inadmissible, under the provisions of § 834 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which prohibits a physician from disclosing "any information which he acquired in attending a patient, in a professional capacity, and which was necessary to enable him to act in that capacity." The agreement of the insured, contained in his application, which waived, for himself, his representatives and beneficiaries, "any and all provisions of law, now or hereafter in force, prohibiting . . . any physician . . . attending me . . . from disclosing, or testifying to any information acquired thereby," and which expressly consented to such testimony being given in any suit, was held below to be insufficient to meet the requirement of § 836 of the Code of Civil Procedure, that the provisions of § 834 must be expressly waived upon the trial by the personal representatives of the deceased patient. Such a waiver was refused at this trial. Our recent decision in Holden v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 165 N. Y. 13, 58 N. E. 771, justified the ruling below upon the question of the force of the waiver in the insurance contract. Theretofore it had been the rule to regard such a waiver as a binding part of the contract of insurance, and, as such, available to the insurer in any action upon the policy. Foley v. Royal Arcanum, 151 N. Y. 196, 56 Am. St. Rep. 621, 45 N. E. 456.

But was there disclosed that relationship of physician and patient between the deceased and Dr. Brusco which made operative the prohibitory provisions of § 834? As the inadmissibility of such testimony is only because of the statute, it is quite important that the case should come very clearly within its terms, however liberal the construction which we should give to an enactment intended to promote the ends of justice. The object of this legislation was to render privileged what communications are made between a physician and his patient, but, obviously it is essential that it shall appear that the person attended is his patient, in the sense in which such a term is ordinarily understood. In Griffiths v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 171 N. Y. 106, 63 N. E. 808, we quite lately had occasion to consider such a question under a state of facts not essentially dissimilar to that now before us. In that case the plaintiff brought his action to recover damages for injuries sustained through the negligence of the defendant's servant, a gripman upon one of its cars. The defendant called a physician as a witness who was at the scene of the accident when an ambulance arrived, and who rendered "first aid" to the plaintiff. The witness was also an attending physician at the hospital to which the plaintiff was assisted by him in the ambulance, but he rendered no further services to him while in the hospital. The witness was asked to relate a conversation which he had with the plaintiff in the hospital subsequently, but the court sustained an objection to its admissibility, under § 834 of the Code, and the witness was not allowed to testify to what was said by plaintiff with reference to his sufferings or to the accident. When the case reached this court, it was held that the exclusion of the physician's evidence was an error, for which the judgment should be reversed, and a new trial had. The decision by this court rested upon the ground that the burden upon the plaintiff of showing that the evidence was within the statutory prohibition had not been met, and that the facts did not warrant the presumption that the relation of physician and patient existed. The opinion quite fully reviewed the cases illustrating the application of the statutory provision in question, and the rule was distinctly adhered to, that, to warrant the application, it must appear that the relation of physician and patient at the time existed, and that the information sought to be excluded was necessary to enable the physician to act as such. Previous to the Griffiths Case, that rule had been expressed in People v. Koerner, 154 N. Y. 355, 48 N. E. 730. Can we say that the rule applies to such a situation as that disclosed in this case, any more than it did in Griffiths's Case? I think not. It seems to me to be difficult to assert, with any gravity of countenance, at least, with Meyer rejecting the witness's presence and services, and cursing him for his interference, and with the witness's determined efforts to prevent Meyer from dying in the hotel, whose servants had summoned him, that the relation of physician and patient arose, and that the confidential relation existed which the statute has in view, and which, with a tender solicitude for a patient's interests, it is designed to safeguard.

The inadmissibility of the testimony of the hospital physicians rests upon a different basis. Both may reasonably be said to have been in attendance upon him as a hospital patient, but, in my opinion, the deposition of Dr. Bruso was erroneously excluded, and therefore I advise the reversal of the judgment.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Allen County to review a judgment modifying a decree of the Court of Common Pleas distributing the proceeds of the chattels of L. E. Bloomfield, which were claimed under various mortgages and laborer's liens. Reversed.

Statement by Burket, Ch. J.:

The facts in this case involve the rights of several mortgagees under chattel mortgages from L. E. Bloomfield, a contractor, engaged in drilling oil wells, in which business he owned and used drilling tools, machinery, horses, wagons, and harness, but was not the owner of any real estate. He gave chattel mortgages to different parties on this property, some of them covering the same property, and all of which were properly executed and filed and kept alive so as to be valid liens upon the property covered by the several mortgages. On February 8, 1901, the National Supply Company, one of said mortgagees, began its action in the court of common pleas of Allen county against said L. E. Bloomfield, making the several chattel mortgagees defendants, and in that action the court appointed receivers, who qualified, and, under the order of the court, took possession of all the property of Mr. Bloomfield, including the property covered by said chattel mortgages, and converted all the property into money, and brought the same into court for distribution. Said chattel mortgages were all past due when said action was commenced. By consent of all parties, the taxes and expenses, including the compensation of the receivers, were paid out of the fund realized upon the sale of the personal property. Many claims for labor performed for Mr. Bloomfield in his said business within three months before said receivers were appointed were filed and allowed, and thereupon a contest arose upon distribution between said mortgagees and said labor claims. The cause came to the circuit court on appeal, and was there heard and determined. There was no contest as to the amount due to each mortgagee or to each laborer, the sole question being as to priorities, the fund not being sufficient to pay all. The circuit court held that the amount due on the labor claims should be first paid in full, and should be deducted pro rata from the fund arising from the sale of the property covered by the several mortgages, without reference to the question of priority of such mortgages as among themselves, and that the remainder thus left to each mortgagee under his mortgage should be paid to him. In the case of the St. Marys Machine Company this holding resulted as follows: Amount found due this company was $1,315.57; net amount realized on sale of property covered by its chattel mortgage, $955.19; amount deducted from that sum and paid over to labor claims $435.75, leaving a balance of $519.44 to be paid over to the company. The other mortgagees were treated in the same manner, the only difference being as to amounts. The mortgagees saved proper exceptions, and brought the case here, seeking to reverse the judgment of the circuit court, and asking for judgment in their favor upon the findings of fact made by that court.

Messrs. D. F. Mooney and Richie, Leeland, & Roby, for plaintiff in error:

The interest of a mortgagee under a chattel mortgage is that of a general owner of §4 L. R. A.

the property mortgaged; and, where there is no reservation of the right to the possession in the mortgagor, the mortgagee is entitled to the possession.

Robinson v. Fitch, 26 Ohio St. 659.

If § 3206a, Rev. Stat. 1892, authorized the court to make the order taking from the machine company $435.75 of the money arising from the sale of property it bought and became the owner of on January 19, 1900 (Robinson v. Fitch, 26 Ohio St. 659; Sayler v. Simpson, 45 Ohio St. 141, 12 N. E. 181), and apply that money in paying claims due for labor, no part of which was performed for nearly ten months after the machine company purchased that property, then this section is in conflict with § 10, art. 1, of the Constitution of the United States; and with § 1, art. 1, and § 23, art. 2, of the Constitution of Ohio.

It will not be presumed that the legislature intended to repeal the sections of the statute which give to a mortgagee of chattels a lien on the property described in the mortgage, which is superior to all other liens upon, or claims against, such chattels, where the mortgagee has fully complied with the statute.

The paragraph directing payment of three months' wages out of the trust fund in the hands of a receiver gave such labor claims "precedence before general creditors," but not over those who have prior liens upon the funds in the hands of the receiver.

Mr. I. B. Longworth, for defendants in error:

The words "all other claims" include all liens by mortgage, chattel or otherwise, and indicate the broad intention of the legislature. Every possible right is excluded from a preference over these claims for labor performed in three months, except costs and taxes. The obligation of a contract depends on the laws in existence when it is made; these are necessarily referred to in all contracts, and form a part of them as the measure of the obligation to perform them by one party, and the right acquired by the other.

Plaintiff in error took its chattel mortgage on the property in question subject to the liability to have the fund arising from the sale of the property under mortgage disbursed first for costs and taxes, then to satisfy the claims for labor performed for Bloomfield within three months prior to such time as his property should come into the hands of a receiver.

Statutes such as the one in question are enacted in the interests of those who are not in position to guard their own interests, and are prompted by a wise public policy, and have uniformly been held to be constitutional.

Burket, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The solution of the controversy between the parties depends upon a proper construction of § 3206a, Rev. Stat. 1892. That section is as follows:

"Laborers and employees of any persons, association of persons, or corporation, whether such employment be at agriculture, mining, manufacture, or other manual labor, shall have a lien upon the real property of their employers for their wages, which is hereby declared to be superior to the following liens taken or attaching during the existence of such unpaid labor claims, to wit: Liens of attachment, liens of mortgages given or taken at a time of actual insolvency of the debtor, or with a view of preferring creditors or to secure a pre-existing debt, and superior to all claims for homestead or other exemptions, except under § 5430; and in all cases where property of an employer is placed in the hands of an assignee, receiver, or trustee, claims due for labor performed within the period of three months prior to the time such assignee, receiver, or trustee is appointed, shall be first paid out of the trust fund, in preference to all other claims against such employer, except claims for taxes and the costs of administering the trust. The lien herein provided shall be deemed to be waived by the laborer or employee, as to any portion of such labor, unless within thirty days from 64 L. R. A.

the expiration of three months from the performance of such portion he shall file with the recorder of the county where the labor was performed an itemized statement verified by affidavit of the amount, kind, and value of the labor performed within said period, with all credits and offsets, and the amount then due him therefor, which verified statement, when so filed, shall be recorded in a book kept for the purpose, and shall become and operate as a lien upon the real property of the employer without any specific description thereof, for the period of one year from and after the filing thereof, and, if an action is brought to enforce the lien within that time, it shall continue in force until finally adjudicated; and the proceedings to enforce such lien shall be the same as in other cases of lien, against the owner of the property and all other persons interested: Provided, that if several persons have or obtain liens under the provisions of this section, against the property of the same employer, they shall have no priority among themselves, but shall be paid pro rata, nor shall they have priority over those obtaining liens under §§ 3184, 3185, 3186, 3187, of this chapter; but the persons obtaining liens under said §§ 3184, 3185, 3186, and 3187 shall have priority as provided therein."

As there was no real estate in this case, the only part of the section here applicable is the following: "And in all cases where property of an employer is placed in the hands of an assignee, receiver, or trustee, claims due for labor performed within the period of three months prior to the time such assignee, receiver, or trustee is appointed, shall be first paid out of the trust fund, in preference to all other claims against such employer, except claims for taxes and the cost of administering the trust." As the amount found due the St. Marys Machine Company was greater than the value of the mortgaged property, as shown by the amount for which it sold, the property covered by the mortgage was the property of the machine company, and not the property of Mr. Bloomfield. All he had was a right of redemption by payment of the debt. Saylor v. Simpson, 45 Ohio St. 141, 150, 12 N. E. 181. This is a property right, but not property itself, within the purview of this section. It was, therefore, not the property of the employer, Mr. Bloomfield, but the property of the machine company, that came into the hands of the receivers in this case, and, according to the holding of this court in Hughes v. City Hall Bank, 61 Ohio St. 386, 55 N. E. 1001, it could not be subjected to the payment of labor claims under this section.

Again, said section provides that such labor claims "shall be first paid out of the trust fund, in preference to all other claims," etc. "Trust funds," under this section, must be the same, whether the estate is in the hands of an assignee, receiver, or trustee; and in all such cases the fund for distribution among creditors generally is known as a "trust fund," because the person in charge of the estate holds the fund in trust for all who can show themselves to be beneficiaries under the general law of the land, and not entitled as owners, in whole or part, by virtue of a special property or particular lien. As to such, the receiver holds the property or its proceeds, not in the sense of a trust fund, but under a special obligation to restore it to its owner.

The correctness of the foregoing holding is strengthened by a reference to § 6355, Rev. Stat. 1892, which is in pari materia with said § 3206a, and both sections must be read and construed together. Section 6355 is as follows: "All taxes of every description assessed against the assignor upon any personal property held by him before his assignment, shall be paid by the assignee or trustee out of the proceeds of the property assigned in preference to any other claims against the assignor, and every person who shall have performed any labor as an operative in the service of the assignor shall be entitled to receive out of the trust funds, before the payment of the other creditors, the full amount of the wages due to such person for such labor performed within twelve months preceding the assignment, not exceeding $300. But the foregoing provisions shall not prejudice, or in any way effect, securities given or liens obtained in good faith, for value, but judgments by confession on warrants of attorney rendered within two months prior to such assignment, or securities given within such time to create a preference among creditors or to secure a pre-existing debt other than upon real estate for the purchase money thereof, shall be of no force or validity as against such claims for labor to the extent above provided, in case of assignment."

This section provides for the distribution of the assets of the estate of an insolvent in cases of assignments for the benefit of creditors, and provides for the payment of labor claims of operatives in the service of the assignor, for labor performed within twelve months, not exceeding $300, but such labor claims cannot prevail over securities given or liens obtained in good faith for value. From this it is clear that the fund out of which such labor claims can be paid, in cases of assignees or trustees in insolvency, is the general fund remaining after the payment of all securities and liens obtained in good faith for value. This general fund corresponds to, and is the same as, the "trust fund" mentioned in said § 3206a, Rev. Stat. 1892, and each of said funds is what remains after the payment of the valid securities and liens against the property in the hands of the assignee or trustee; and to the extent of such securities and liens, construing both sections together, the property in the hands of the assignee or trustee is not regarded as the property of the employer, but as the property of the owner of the security or lien, and as being so connected with the property of the employer or assignor as to require the whole to be administered by the assignee or trustee, rendering to the owner of the securities and liens the proceeds of their property, and distributing by order of the probate court the remainder among the general creditors, subject to the rights of labor claims. Under the one section a labor claim includes all labor within twelve months, not exceeding $300, and in the other the period is only three months, with no limitation as to amount. In this regard there seems to be some conflict, but in any particular case the laborer should be allowed to invoke the provision most favorable to himself.

Said § 6355 applies only to assignees and trustees, while the other section applies to assignees, trustees, and receivers; but, when the section is properly construed as to assignees and trustees, the same construction must be applied to receivers, because in said § 3206a all three stand upon exactly the same footing.

This section of the statute has been differently construed by the circuit court in several cases, and, while the true construction may not be clear at a glance, after mature deliberation, and a full examination of the principles involved, the above construction seems to be clearly warranted, and, when so construed, the section is constitutional. With this construction of the section, the other questions so ably argued by counsel become unimportant, and are not here considered.

The judgment of the Circuit Court will be reversed, and cause remanded to that court with instructions to render a judgment of distribution, applying the net proceeds of the sale of the property covered by each chattel mortgage to the payment of the amount due upon such mortgage, preserving priorities where there are two or more chattel mortgages on the same property, and that the balance, if any, be applied upon the labor claims pro rata.

Judgment reversed, and judgment for plaintiff in error.

I. How intent to exercise power evidenced.

a. General rules and principles.

As is well known, very many of the questions which come before the courts for their determination depend upon the facts and circumstances of each particular case. While certain well-known general rules and principles, in a sense, are considered in the decision of all the cases, yet individual instances are constantly arising, in which some particular exists which will cause an exception to or qualification or novel application of, such general rule. This truth is exemplified in the numerous and varied cases which have been brought forth by the different courts and judges, in an endeavor to decide when, and under what circumstances, the will of one having a power of appointment will be deemed an execution or exercise of the power. The general rule would seem to be, in substance, that, in order successfully to exercise a power of appointment, the donee thereof must, in the attempt to do so, have made some allusion to, or taken notice of, the power itself, or in some manner referred to the property or matter which is the subject of it; from which an intention to execute the power is plainly apparent. That is to say,—that was the original rule at common law. Later the English courts of equity introduced another proof of the intention of the donee of the power to execute the same, viz., where it was apparent that the will of the donee would otherwise be inoperative.

Three classes of cases have been held to be sufficient demonstrations of an intended execution of a power by will: (1) Where there has been some reference in the will to the power; (2) or a reference to the property, which is the subject on which it is to be executed; (3) or where the provision in the will executed by the donee of the power would have no operation, except as an execution of the power. *Lee v. And it has also been held that, where the donee of a power created by a will devised to the identical persons, and no others, who were designated in the will, that fact produces the conviction that she was then intending to exercise the authority given her by the donor of the power, and it will be deemed to have been intentional and not accidental, among near relations, for the donee could not have disposed of property to anyone else. Johnston v. Knight, 117 N. C. 122, 23 S. E. 92.

An express declaration of the intent to execute a power of appointment by will need not appear on the face of the will, provided such intention otherwise sufficiently appears. While this general rule is apparently a simple one, the inquiry as to what state of things sufficiently manifests an intention in a testator to execute a power by his will, to which power he does not specifically refer, has given rise to the greater part of the cases on the question whether a pre-existing power has been actually executed by a subsequent will. Pepper's Will, 1 Para. Sel. Eq. Cas. 486.

Whether a power of appointment has been exercised is a question of intention, and a question of intention only. Re Rickman, 80 L. T. N. S. 518.

Where a person has a general power of appointment over personal estate, and by his will appoints the estate to executors, it is always a question of intention whether the power is exercised or not; and when the subject of the power is personal estate, and the appointment is made to the executors of the donee of the power, the presumption is that it was intended to make the fund part of the personal estate of the donee. Re Van Hagan, L. In Doe ex dem. Nowell v. Roake, 2 Bing. 497, 10 J. B. Moore, 118, where a person, who was seised of one undivided moiety of the estate by purchase and had the power of disposing of the other undivided moiety, made her will, whereby she gave and devised to her nephew all her freehold estates in the city of London and county of Surrey, or elsewhere, for his life, on condition that out of the rents thereof he keep such estates in proper and tenantable repair, this was held by the common pleas to be a good and sufficient exercise of the power. The court said that it had often been said that a power is not executed, unless the power or the estate be referred to by the will, or the will can have no effect except as an execution of the power, but that these were not the only cases; that they were only put as instances of the strong and unequivocal proof that is required; but that, even if there was a rule that courts of law are only permitted to hold a power well executed in these instances, they thought that this case came within it; but that the fact that the devise was upon condition that out of the rents thereof—that is, out of the rents of the entire property—the devisee should from time to time keep such estate in repair; and as he could not keep an undivided moiety in repair, but must repair the whole, or have the whole without repair,—these words, therefore, clearly refer to the property; and that if they do, the entire property was referred to in the devise.

Upon a writ of error to the common pleas, the King's bench reversed this judgment (Denn ex dem. Noel v. Roake, 8 Dowl. & R. 514, 5 Barn. & C. 720), saying that, while they might think the testatrix intended that the entirety should go in strict settlement on the family of the sister of the testatrix (the nephew), according to the directions of her will, yet it was possible to suppose that the testatrix had no intention to execute the power; and, if the intention to execute the power be doubtful, the will cannot be deemed an execution of it. No answer was made by the court to the reasoning of Best, Ch. J., in the common pleas, that the condition to keep in repair was indicative of the intention of the testatrix to execute the power as to the undivided moiety, as it would be impossible to keep an undivided moiety in repair; and the devise must, therefore, have been intended by her to relate to the whole property, the undivided moiety that she owned and the other, over which she only had the power of appointment.

The case was afterwards removed by writ of error to the House of Lords, where the decision of the King's bench, reversing that of the common pleas, was affirmed. Alexander, C. B., who delivered the opinion of all the judges, saying, in reference to the position taken by Best, Ch. J., in the common pleas, that the circumstance of the condition that the devisee for life should, out of the rents and profits of the devised premises, keep them in tenantable repair, that the direction respecting the repairs had no effect in proving, according to the authorities, that the testatrix meant to execute her authority over the undivided moiety of the estate; that there was no incongruity in directing a tenant for life of an undivided moiety to keep his share in the premises in repair; that a person with such an interest is not without remedies for enforcing repairs, and, at the worst, the devise would make him liable as against the remainderman for dilapidation. Denn ex dem. Nowell v. Roake, 6 Bing. 475, 1 Dow & C. 437, 4 Bligh N. R. 8.

The decisions both of the King's bench and of the House of Lords seem to have been a strict enforcement of the rule laid down in a number of cases, that a general devise of a person having a power of appointment, who possesses property other than that over which such power appertains, will not operate as an exercise of the power to dispose of the property under the appointment, unless the intention to do so is undoubtedly expressed by some reference, either to the property covered by the power, or to the fact that it is done by virtue of the power. The reasoning of Best, Ch. J., in the common pleas has been frequently cited and quoted, and generally commended, by American courts and judges, notably by Story, J., in the oft-cited case of Blagge v. Miles, infra.

Blagge v. Miles, 1 Story, 426, Fed. Cas. No. 1,479, is an authority that has been cited more than any other in the United States, for the doctrine that, in considering the question as to whether or not the power of appointment has been exercised, the general rule is that the intention of the testator is the polestar to direct the court in the interpretation of wills, 64 L. R. A.

and that technical words and set phrases are controlled by, and do not control, that intention, when clearly expressed or positively ascertained. That three classes of cases are sufficient demonstrations of an intended execution of the power by will: (1) Where there has been some reference in the will to the power; (2) or a reference to the property, which is the subject, on which it is to be executed; (3) or, where the provision in the will, executed by the donee of the power, would otherwise be ineffectual or a mere nullity; in other words, it would have no operation except as an execution of the power. The court said that Mr. Chief Justice Best, in Doe ex dem. Nowell v. Roake, 2 Bing. 497, 10 J. B. Moore, 118, had put these classes of cases upon the true ground. They are instances of the strong and unequivocal proof required to establish the intention to execute the power; but they are not the only cases. On the contrary, if a case of clear intention should arise, although not falling within the predicament of these classes, it must be held that the power is well executed, unless courts of justice are at liberty to overturn principles, instead of interpreting acts and intentions. Judge Story said, further, that he entirely agreed with Lord Chief Justice Best in his remark in Roake v. Denn, 4 Bligh N. R. 22, 6 Bing. 475, 1 Dow & C. 437, that "rules with respect to evidence of intention are bad rules, and I trust I shall live to see them no longer binding on the judges." The court said that it was unnecessary to refer at large to the cases which establish these propositions. That the rule of ascertaining the intention has been recognized at all times; and that if the judges in construing the particular words of different powers, have appeared to make contradictory decisions at different times, it is not that they have denied the general rule, but because some of them have erred in the application of the general rule to the particular case before them. That in case of wills, where the intention is to govern, no authorities ought to control the interpretation which the court is called upon to make, unless all the circumstances are the same in both cases, and the ground of interpretation in one is entirely satisfactory to the mind as applied to the other. In this case a woman, having the power of appointment under the provisions of a will to dispose of certain real estate, made her own will, whereby she devised the residue of her estate of every name and nature. This was held to be the same as though she had devised the residue of her estate, real as well as personal; and it was held that it would be sufficient to pass real estate if she had owned any in her own right, and, the fact being that she had no real estate over which she had any control, except that left by the will of the father, the testator, as to which by that will she had a power of appointment, her will was a valid exercise of that power.

Before the passage of the act 7 Wm. IV. & 1 Vict. chap. 26, the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts established the rule that a testamentary paper executed by a woman after her marriage happening after a contract entered into between the man and woman and a trustee in contemplation of the marriage, in which the man covenanted that the woman might, during coverture, make a testamentary disposition of any sum of money or personal effects not exceeding a certain amount, being less than he afterwards received by the marriage; and that he would pay over to her executor, after her death, the amount so bequeathed, which bequeathed all her estate, real and personal,—meaning all the estate and property reserved to her at her own disposal by the marriage contract,—was a valid appointment under the marriage contract, as it was manifest that the intent was to dispose of all the personal estate of which the power of disposal was reserved to the wife, and that the use of the superfluous term "real estate" did not vitiate the appointment so far as it was well exercised pursuant to the power. Newburyport Bank v. Stone, 13 Pick. 420.

A single woman conveyed all her real and personal estate to trustees upon trust to manage the property and pay the income of it to her during her life, and convey it to such persons as she should, by her last will, designate. By her will she gave and devised one half of all the estate, real, personal, and mixed, of which she should die seised or possessed, to trustees for the benefit of the family of a brother; one tenth in trust for her sister and her children; and the residue of her said estate to four brothers and sisters, naming them in the will. The court held that this was a valid exercise of the appointment reserved by her to herself under the conveyance as mentioned, adding that a general devise of all of the testator's estate will operate as an execu-

Where one had conveyed land on a consideration which moved from him, to be held upon a trust which secured to him the entire beneficial interest therein during his life, and power of appointment in respect thereof by will, a will executed by him, which makes specific provision for certain heirs at law, and then, by a general clause, disposes of all the rest of his estate, operates as an appointment in respect to such land. Bangs v. Smith, 98 Mass. 270.

There is a material practical difference between a will and an appointment by will. A married woman may make an appointment by the common law, but cannot make a will except as authorized by recent statutes. The theoretical distinction is that a will concerns the estate of a testator, and an appointment under a power that of the donor or the power. It is the exercise of the power of designation as to the estate of the donor, and is the same when given or reserved to the wife, as to her own estate, in an antenuptial contract between the parties intending marriage. Osgood v. Bliss, 141 Mass. 474, 55 Am. Rep. 538, 6 N. E. 527.

By the decisions in Massachusetts it would seem that the rule has been that, unless there is something in a will which it is claimed exercises the power of appointment, to show that a testator did not intend to exercise the power, a general residuary devise will operate as a valid execution of the power. Hassam v. Hazen, 158 Mass. 93, 30 N. E. 469.

A married woman who had, before her marriage, by a trust deed, conveyed certain property to the trustees upon trusts to pay the net income to her during her life, and at her decease pay, distribute, and convey the trust property to and among such persons as she should by her last will and testament appoint, and, in default of such testamentary appointment, then to pay and convey the same to and among such persons as would be entitled thereto by the statute of distributions of intestate estates, by her will gave, devised, and bequeathed all the rest, residue, and remainder of her property, real, personal, and mixed, that she then had or might thereafter acquire, to her husband, to him and his heirs and assigns forever, with a request that her husband assign by will "what of this property I now

That the Massachusetts rule is adopted in New Hampshire is seen in Emery v. Haven, 67 N. H. 503, 35 Atl. 940, where the supreme court of New Hampshire declined to follow the English rule in determining whether a will exercised a power of appointment, and held that, although in the appointer's will there was no mention of the power, nor of the property to which it related, and he had other property upon which the will operated, as was the case in Kimball v. New Hampshire Bible Soc. 65 N. H. 139, 23 Atl. 83-85, infra, I. d. 2, the will would, nevertheless, operate as a valid exercise of the power; saying that the same rule prevailed in Massachusetts, and had then been effected in New York and in England by statute.

When the donee of a power of appointment refers to it, or when he disposes of the subject of it by such a description as identifies it, or when the instrument of execution cannot have any operation except on the ground that the donee intended to execute the power, the intent to execute it is free from uncertainty. Clermontel's Estate, 12 Phila. 139.

A freehold messuage described by name was, by an indenture, conveyed to a trustee to such uses and upon such trusts as a married woman should by deed or will appoint, and, in default thereof during her life, and after her death and such default of appointment, to her husband absolutely. The husband, by his will, devised a certain yearly fee-farm rent payable out of such messuage, and certain furniture and other articles therein, unto his wife absolutely, and then gave the residue of his estate and effects, real and personal, to the trustee to sell and pay out of the proceeds his debts and legacies, and deal with the ultimate proceeds as thereby provided. After his death the wife, by her will, gave all the real and personal estate of which she might be possessed or to which she might be entitled, or of which, by 64 L. R. A.

Spruance, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The complainant below, Fannie S. Lane, administratrix of Jesse Lane, filed her bill in the court of chancery for New Castle county against Martin Lane, trustee, and the other respondents, for an accounting by the said trustee, and for a decree that he pay to the complainant a certain legacy, virtue of any power or authority, she was competent to dispose in the manner therein stated; and then, after making certain devises and bequests in which she treated the subjects of such devises and bequests as her own, she gave the property which formed the subject of the power to her husband and made him her residuary legatee. She made no distinction in her will between property which belonged to her and property over which she had only a power of disposition. It was held that by this will she indicated her intention that the power should be exercised and that the property to which it related should be deemed hers for all purposes; and that it went to her heirs, and not to those of her husband by default of appointment. Coxen v. Rowland [1894] 1 Ch. 406, 63 L. J. Ch. N. S. 179, 8 Reports, 525, 70 L. T. N. S. 89, 42 Week. Rep. 568.

A testatrix entitled for life, under her marriage settlement, to the dividends and interest of a fund and a small sum of cash, with a general power of appointment, where there had been previous appointments by deed of her husband and herself generally, and herself alone after his death,—made her will whereby she confirmed the former appointments, and then, after giving a sum theretofore appointed by deed to a son who had thereafter died, to be paid to another son in trust for the son of the deceased, and bequeathed to two other sons certain lands, gave, bequeathed, and devised the residue and remainder of her estate unto two sons, and appointed another son and a daughter as executors. It was held that the will, being one which, while it appointed executors, did so in a way not indicating any intention to deal with the property as testatrix's own, and one which did not in terms charge debts and funeral expenses on the property dealt with, operated as an execution of the power of appointment in all its parts. Peirce v. McNeale [1894] Ir. Rep. 1 Ch. Div. 118.

Where one is vested with an estate for life, but with power to appoint in fee, a devise by such donee of the power, of the property as her own, is a good exercise of the power. Morgan ex dem. Surman v. Surman, 1 Taunt. 289. The court said that it would be different if she had an interest in the reversion as well as the power. It was also held that in this case there was no such thing as an illusory appoint-with its increase and income, alleged to be the property of the complainant as administratrix as aforesaid. The case was heard by the chancellor upon bill and answer and an agreed statement of facts. The following are the material facts disclosed by the record:

Jesse Lane, the elder, by his will bearing date April 15, 1880, bequeathed, inter alia, as follows: "Item 8. I give and bequeath unto Edward Bringham, Jr., the sum of fifty thousand dollars, in special trust to invest the same in some safe and productive securities, with power from time to time to call in and reinvest the same, as may be necessary, and all the interest, dividends, and income which may accrue therefrom to receive and pay over into the proper hands of my son, Augustin S. Lane, for his sole use during his natural life; and upon his decease then in trust to dispose of said principal sum of fifty thousand dollars in such manner as my said son Augustin by his last will and testament, or by any writing executed as such, shall direct and appoint, and in default of such appointment then in trust to pay and distribute the said principal sum of fifty thousand dollars to and among the children of my said son Augustin living at the time of his death and the issue of any deceased child of said Augustin in equal shares but so that such issue of any child of said Augustin, deceased in his lifetime, shall take among them equally, if more than one, only the share their parent, if living, would take; and, in default of any children or is-ment in law, whatever might be the rule in equity.

A widow having the power, under her late husband's will, of appointing a portion of the sum directed by his will to be set aside for the purpose of producing an annuity to be paid to her during her life by an appointment in the nature of a last will and testament, exercises such power by a will whereby she devises all her estate, real and personal, to one of her children. Bolton v. DePeyster, 25 Barb. 539.

Where a general power of appointment resides in a married woman, her will, although as such and for the purpose of conveying property it is utterly void, may still be good as an appointment, which is the mere exercise of the power to designate the persons who are to take the beneficial use of the estate. Cueman v. Broadnax, 37 N. J. L. 508.

This is upon the original theory that while a married woman could not make a valid will, she could, by an instrument in the nature of a will, exercise the power of appointment; the idea being that she did not act herself, but merely as the attorney or agent of the donor to carry out his wishes, although the particular manner was left to her as such attorney or agent.

Bradish v. Gibbs, 3 Johns. Ch. 523, is a case frequently cited in favor of the doctrine that a feme covert may execute by will, in favor of her husband, a power given or reserved to her while sole, over her real estate, and this whether the real estate over which such power is exercised has come to her from some other person or has been reserved by her in an antenuptial agreement; and that in either case she may, in the exercise of the power, by her last will devise the whole or any part of such estate to her husband. The decision by Chancellor Kent goes into a history of the dispute in England over the question as to the ability of the wife to make the devise in favor of her husband,—particularly when the estate has come originally from herself by antenuptial agreement; but he finally concludes that the case of Rippon v. Dawling, 2 Amb. 585, infra, I. c., had put the question completely at rest. He admitted that the husband's claim to his wife's bounty is to be closely inspected, and wholly free from symptoms of coercion and undue influence, but that, in a fair case, which has no such imputation, and where there is no offspring to claim a divided attention, the wife's bounty is reasonable and just, springing, as it does, from the best of human ties, and founded on the warmest affections of the heart. But after this slight indulgence in what might seem to be somewhat of the sentimental, the chancellor proceeds to give the best reason for the holding, in that there is less danger of improper influence in his exercise over the wife in case of an appointment by will than by deed; because a will, made in execution of a power, still retains all the properties of a will, and is revocable at the pleasure of the wife.

In considering whether a power of appointment has been exercised by the will of a testatrix, who was also disposing of what belonged to herself absolutely, and she could do with it what she could not do under the power, a bequest which she could not give under the power must be attributed to her unlimited authority as owner; and whatever was required in the proper exercise of her power of appointment must be regarded as done by virtue of it, and the will is to be construed, therefore, in such manner as to make it efficient for both purposes, rather than that it should be allowed to fail, in whole or in part, as to either. Van Syckel's Estate, 24 Pa. Co. Ct. 241.

In the cases in which the question arises as to whether a power of appointment has been duly exercised, the true test is, What was the intention of the donee of the power? And so, where a will provided for the testator's wife in a manner which became inoperative and unimportant upon her death, and gave the whole residue of his property in trust for his children and their issue, and he afterward, his wife having died, by a deed of trust conveyed an undivided fourth of the parcel of real estate which constituted the bulk of his property to trustees, two of whom were also trustees under his will, in trust for his six children by name and their issue; and, in case of their death without issue, in trust for his own heirs, and reserved to himself the most complete and absolute power, by deed or will, to alter the uses or the trusts; and thereafter he married again, and subsequently lost one of his sons, who was a trustee under the will and deed of trust, by death; and after that he made a codicil, and died the day after it was made, which codicil first gave to his wife "in fee simple, one-sixth part of the whole estate and property, real, personal, or mixed, whereof I die sue of the said Augustin surviving him, then in trust to pay over and dispose of the said sum of fifty thousand dollars, and any and all other sum of money held by said trustee for the use and benefit of said Augustin under the provision of this will, in equal shares to my son, Martin Lane, and to the trustee herein appointed for my daughter, Anna B. Elliott, and to the trustee herein appointed for my daughter, Sally Harvey, to be held by said trustee in special trust to invest, apply, and dispose of in the same manner and subject in all respects to the trusts declared respecting the several legacies herein bequeathed in trust for my said daughters, Anna B. Elliott and Sally Harvey," etc.

The said testator, Jesse Lane, was, at the time of making said will and at the time of his death, domiciled in and a citizen of the state of Delaware; and his will was proved before the register of wills for New Castle county. He died in the year 1881, leaving to survive him the said Augustin S. Lane, Martin Lane, Anna B. Elliott, and Sally Harvey. The said trustee, Edward Bringham, Jr., renounced and disclaimed the said trusts, and Martin Lane was duly appointed by the chancellor trustee in his stead. The said Martin Lane at the time of his appointment was and now is domiciled in and a citizen of the state of Delaware. The said legacy of $50,000 was paid to the said Martin Lane, trustee, who continued to execute the trusts during the lifetime of the said Augustin S. Lane. The said trust possessed;" followed by a statement: "It being my intention to give to her what would be her legal share if she were one of my children."—It was held that the codicil operated as an execution of the power of disposal of all the property conveyed by the deed of trust, and that the second wife was entitled to one-sixth part of the whole residue of the estate remaining for distribution after the settlement of the estate, including the property described in the deed of trust, in fee simple. Willard v. Ware, 10 Allen, 263.

In considering the question whether a power has been executed by the donee thereof, it is not enough that it is possible, but not certain, that he intended an execution of the power, for it must not be forgotten that, when handling such a question, the court is dealing with the property of another, and not with that of the donee of the power; that in the donee it is but a trust, and those interested in the estate of the donor have a right to know that the will of their testator has been actually executed as he intended, by the donee of his power. And hence, they are entitled to certainties, not mere conjectures or possibilities. Bingham's Appeal, 64 Pa. 345, infra, I. f.

The true test of whether a person having a power of appointment has exercised the same is, Is there a distinct intention to execute the power? And an instrument in which the persons to take and the amount to be taken are sufficiently pointed out, but which the donee of the power purposely abstains from executing, and in which such donee says, in effect, that she knows she has the power to appoint the funds, but does not exercise it, will not be deemed a valid execution of the power, as the jurisdiction of the court is to supply defects caused by mistake or inadvertence, but not to supply omissions intentionally made. Garth v. Townsend, L. R. 7 Eq. 220.

In Re Bidwell, 1 New Reports, 176, 32 L. J. Ch. N. S. 71, 9 Jur. N. S. 37, 8 L. T. N. S. 107, 11 Week. Rep. 161, the vice chancellor said that, as the nature of the trust declared by the will was inconsistent with a right exercise of the power, and another construction was possible, he could not attribute to the testator an intention to exercise the power; and the court will not attribute to a testator an intention to dispose of property not his own, un- 64 L. R. A.

Where a power of appointment by deed or will had been, before the death of the donee of the power, effectually exercised, and the property disposed of by deed, his will, in which he plainly says he does not intend to deal with any property "otherwise effectually disposed of," shows an express intention not thereby to exercise the power of appointment. Moss v. Harter, 2 Smale & G. 458, 18 Jur. 973, 2 Week. Rep. 540.

In Van Wert v. Benedict, 1 Bradf. 114, it was said that by the common law, and previous to the act, 1 Vict. chap. 26, a general devise, however unlimited in its terms, did not operate as an appointment, and that to make a will take effect as an execution of a power, there must have been either an express reference to the power itself, or its subject, the property held under it.

Where a wife took a life estate in the land and personal estate mentioned in her husband's will, with a power of appointment among the children at her death, her will, which does not refer to the power or purport to act under it, and does not mention specifically any of the property willed to her by her husband, but professes simply to dispose of her own estate, does not have effect as an exercise of the power. Holt v. Hogan, 58 N. C. (5 Jones, Eq.) 82.

No general devise or bequest of all a testator's property, real and personal, nor any general residuary clause, will be, in itself, a sufficient exercise of a power of appointment by the testator. Pepper's Will, 1 Pars. Sel. Eq. Cas. 436.

Where a testator in his lifetime, by a voluntary deed, assigned all his personal estate in trust, to pay the interest thereon to himself for life, and after his death to such as he should appoint by will for their lives, and, subject to such condition, to pay the principal to his next of kin who should be living at his decease, and thereafter made a will by which he gave certain legacies and the residue to persons by name, who were his next of kin at the time of the making of the voluntary deed and at his death, the power of appointment is not executed by such a will. Griffin v. Nanson, 4 Ves. Jr. 343.

In Sloane v. Cadogan, 2 Sugden, Powers. Appx. No. 9, it was held that it was now settled that a general disposition does not include tee had never rendered or passed any account of said trust fund or its income.

The said Augustin S. Lane made his last will and testament, bearing date October 8, 1887, whereby he devised and bequeathed, inter alia, as follows: "(2) All my estate, real and personal, of whatever kind and wheresoever situate, I give, devise, and bequeath to my brother, Martin Lane, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, in trust to safely invest and keep the same invested, and out of the income derived therefrom to pay to my wife, Fannie, during the term of her natural life, the sum of twelve hundred dollars per annum, in twelve equal monthly payments of one hundred dollars each, and in further trust to pay out of the remaining income from my said estate a sum sufficient for the support and education of my son Jesse, until he shall arrive at the age of twenty-one years, at which time I give and devise and bequeath to him all my estate (except such part as may be required to pay the above annuity to my wife), to my said son Jesse, his heirs and assigns, absolutely; and, in the event of my said son dying before the age of twenty-one without leaving children living at the time of his decease, then my will is that the part of my estate so as aforesaid willed to him shall belong to and be the property of the same persons who, under the intestate laws of Pennsylvania, would be entitled to the same if I had died unmarried and without issue and intestate. My will being that no estate (other than sufficient of the income property over which the party had only a power, unless an intention to do so appears.

A testator entitled, under the will of another, to a considerable sum, settled a certain amount of the sum on his daughter on her marriage, and, on his own second marriage, a certain amount on his wife for life, with a reservation, in default of issue, to such persons as he should appoint by will, and, in default of appointment, to his next of kin; and he thereafter made his will, reciting that, under the will of the person mentioned, he was entitled to considerable sums, and that he had settled an amount on his daughter, part thereof, and an amount upon his wife upon his marriage; and he ratified and confirmed the settlement upon his daughter and wife; and as to all the residue and remainder of his money to which he was entitled under the original will mentioned, he gave them upon trusts which would eventuate in the entitling of his wife. It was held that the residuary gift in his will was not an exercise of the power of appointment reserved to him in the settlement; and that the sum settled upon his wife for life belonged to his next of kin. Re Bringlee, 26 L. T. N. S. 58.

Where, under a settlement, a testator had, in an event which happened, power to appoint a sum certain which was to be raised after his decease by the terms to which the fee of the same estate was subject; and in his will there was no manner of reference to the settlement, or to the power of the testator to appoint,—the will cannot operate directly as an exercise of the power to appoint the sum mentioned. Farmer v. Bradford, 3 Russ. Ch. 354, 5 L. J. Ch. 157, 27 Revised Rep. 89.

One having a power of appointment to one or more of his children, by his will, devised and bequeathed all his real and personal estate to trustees to pay and apply the yearly rents of his real estate, one third to his wife for life during widowhood, and the other two thirds for the benefit of his three sons. This was held not to be a good execution of the power, inasmuch as it contained no reference to the power, or to the property which was the subject of it, from which it could naturally be inferred that the donee, in confirming his will, had the power in contemplation. Doe ex dem. Caldecott v. Johnson, 7 Mann. & G. 1047.

One having the power of appointment, by a will, to a certain sum and also an interest in the residue of the donor's personal estate, by 64 L. R. A.

her will bequeathed three legacies, one of one half of the amount, and two of one fourth of the amount each, and then gave a certain sum to each of her executors; and her will contained the following clause: "Forasmuch as the amount of my property is not yet ascertained, the same awaiting the settlement of my late mother's affairs, my will is that, if my money and personal estate should not be sufficient to pay the said legacies in full, the legatees shall make an abatement;" and then followed a residuary clause. This was held not to be an execution of her power of appointment. Buxton v. Buxton, 1 Keen, 753.

Where one having an estate of his own in one county and another in another county, and having, also, the legal, but no beneficial, estate in still another, with power of appointing it to either of his sons by his will devised all his estates of what nature or kind soever in the first-named county, and at places in the second county, or elsewhere in the Kingdom of England, after payment of his debts, etc., this was held not to be a good exercise of the power as to the estate in the third county. Roe ex dem. Reade v. Reade, 8 T. R. 118.

Where one having a general power of appointment over real estate, and also personal estate consisting of household furniture, linen, and plate, by her will gave "all my estate and effects of whatsoever denomination" to certain persons, subject to legacies and an annuity, and also "my household linen and plate;" but made no reference to the power, or to the property subjected to it, other than the language last quoted,—the will was not a good execution of the power, either as to the real or personal property. Jones v. Curry, 1 Wils. Ch. 24, 1 Swanst. 66.

A donee of the power to dispose by will, who has no interest in the subject-matter, making no mention in his will of the gift or of the power, nor any reference to the instrument by which it was created, has failed to execute the power. Long v. Landis, 9 Lanc. Bar, 153.

A testator by his will devised certain real estate to trustees upon trust for life, and then for his son for life, and after his death for such one or more of his children or other issue born in his lifetime as he, the son, should, by deed or will, appoint, and, in default, upon trust for the son's children equally. After the death of the widow the son, by his will, after appointing trustees and executors and giving for his support) shall vest in my said son until he shall arrive at the age of twenty-one years, or, in the event of his sooner dying leaving children him surviving, that the estate shall vest in such child or children who may be living at his decease. (3) At the death of my said wife I direct that the part of my estate which may be retained by my said trustee to secure the annuity to her shall go and belong to the same person or persons and for the same estate as is expressed in the second clause of my will with respect to that part of my estate therein bequeathed and devised."

The said Augustin S. Lane was at the time of making his said will and at the time of his death domiciled in and a citizen of the state of Pennsylvania; and his will was proved before the register of wills for Delaware county in said state. He died in the year 1890 leaving to survive him his widow, the said Fannie S. Lane, and one child, Jesse Lane, Jr., his only issue. The said Jesse Lane, Jr., died in the year 1899, intestate, unmarried, without issue, and not having attained the age of twenty-one years. The said Fannie S. Lane was duly appointed and qualified as his administratrix. The said Augustin S. Lane left a personal estate, after payment of debts, of $52,513.70. The chancellor decreed that said will of Augustin S. Lane was not an execution of the power of appointment given to him by the will of his father, Jesse Lane, and that the said legacy of $50,000, held by the said Martin Lane as trustee as aforesaid, should his furniture and other household effects to his wife absolutely, devised and bequeathed all his real and personal estate not thereby otherwise disposed of unto his trustees upon trust to sell and convert and out of the proceeds to pay, the income of a sum certain to his widow, and the remainder as to the capital in trust for his children by her or their issue, as his wife should appoint, and, in default, in trust for his children by her. He afterwards died, and neither at the date of his will, nor at his death, had he any real estate of his own. In holding that there was no execution of the power, Kay, J., said: "On the best consideration I can give, in this case, to the words of the will, and to the circumstances of the testator at the time, I do not believe he intended to exercise this special power. If not exercised, the property would go, in default, amongst all his children. It is reasonable to suppose he desired not to disturb that provision. I believe either that he forgot all about the power, or that he desired not to exercise it. If he forgot the power, but intended to pass the property subject to it, possibly that might be sufficient; but I cannot find anything to satisfy me that this was his intention. The burden of proof is on those who assert affirmatively that the power was exercised. The court must be satisfied of this by sufficient evidence. I am not so satisfied. The inclination of my opinion is that the testator did not intend to exercise this special power." Re Mills, L. R. 34 Ch. Div. 186, 58 L. J. Ch. N. S. 118, 53 L. T. N. S. 665, 35 Week. Rep. 133.

It is difficult to see why this decision is not opposed to the line of cases which hold that, where the provision in the will executed by the donee of the power would have no operation, except as an execution of the power, the will will be held to be an intended execution of the power; as, having no real estate of his own, the devise by the testator of all of his real estate would be inoperative, except as an exercise of the power.

Where, under a marriage settlement, real estate was left to the intended husband and wife during their lives, and thereafter for the children of the wife as she should by will appoint, and, in default of such appointment, in equal shares, and, in default of children, for such person as the wife should by will appoint, and, in default, for the wife, her heirs, and assigns; and thereafter there were four children 64 L. R. A.

of the marriage, of whom only one, a son, was surviving at the commencement of this proceeding,—it was held that the gift and devise by the wife, contained in her will in pursuance of all the powers and authorities in anywise enabling her thereto, whereby she did give and devise, direct and appoint, all her property, real and personal, to trustees to pay the income of a moiety thereof to her son for life; then to his wife for life; and then upon trust for their children; and as to the other moiety, upon trust for persons not objects of the power,—was not, in all these circumstances, sufficient evidence to show an intention on the part of the testatrix to execute her separate power of appointment in favor of her son. The court held that there was an absence in this case of such evidence as had been held admissible in other cases, namely, that this special power was only a testamentary power to which the testatrix was entitled: that not only was there no such evidence, but it was obvious that it could not be given, because the testatrix by the settlement itself had a general testamentary power; that as regarded the beneficial interests conferred, only one was within the scope of the power, namely, the life interest to the son; and that the court was not satisfied, under those circumstances, that the intention of the testatrix was to exercise that power. Re Rickman, 80 L. T. N. S. 518.

Before the passing of the act 7 Wm. IV. & 1 Vict., a married woman was competent to dispose of her property over which she had a power of appointment exercisable during coverture. By the act her capacity in that respect remains unaltered; but the provisions of the act as to the mode by which a power was to be exercised by her, and all the other provisions of the act, will apply to any testamentary instrument which a married woman would have been competent to execute prior to the passing of the act, just as it would apply to any testamentary instrument executed by any person sui juris. The legislature says: "We will not enlarge your disposing power, but that power shall be exercised, and shall be construed and operated upon, in the manner here provided." Bernard v. Minshull, Johns. V. C. (Eng.) 278, 28 L. J. Ch. N. S. 649, 5 Jur. N. S. 931.

Although it is not necessary to the due execution of a power that it should be recited or expressly referred to, there must yet be something to show that the party intended to exebe paid to the said Fannie S. Lane, administratrix of Jesse Lane, Jr., with the accrued income thereof, since the death of the said Augustin, less the amount of such income paid to the said Jesse Lane, Jr., in his lifetime, and that the said trustee should state and file an account of the income of said trust fund since the death of the said Augustin. From said decree this appeal was taken.

The question for our determination is whether, by the will of Augustin S. Lane, there was a valid execution of the power of appointment given to him by the said eighth item of the will of his father, Jesse Lane, the elder. If there was not, then under the will of Jesse Lane, the elder, upon the death of Augustin S. Lane, his son and only surviving issue, Jesse Lane, Jr., became entitled absolutely to the trust fund, and his administratrix, the complainant below, is entitled to recover the same, with the accrued interest and income thereof. The rules of the common law applicable to this case have been quite well established by numerous decisions in England and in this country.

In Parker v. Kett, 12 Mod. 469, decided in 1701, it was said by the court: "When one has an authority, and does an act which can be good no other way but by virtue and in pursuance of that authority, it shall rather be understood to have been by force of his authority, than void, though in doing the act he takes no notice of his authority; but where one has an interest and an authority together, and he does an act cute it. Den ex dem. Micbeau v. Crawford, 8 N. J. L. 90.

b. Reference in donee's will to the power.

It has always been held that a plain, unequivocal reference, by the donee in his will, to the power, such as will indicate a certain intention on the part of such donee to exercise the power, will be a sufficient execution thereof; and the cases immediately following illustrate when and under what circumstances it has been decided that the will of the donee was a valid exercise of the power.

Whether a power of appointment is duly exercised is always a question of intention of the donee, and, while the will of one possessing the power of appointment to his children directed therein that the property to which a part of the will related be converted and used for the payment of his funeral and other expenses, debts, and legacies, and attempted to settle the interest of his daughters for their benefit, and after their deaths on their respective husbands and children,—were all things which were clearly not within the power, yet this circumstance did not operate to rebut the presumption of his intention being to exercise the power of appointment, where, by express words in the will, he stated his intention to be to deal with all the property which he should in any way have power to dispose of, or appoint by will. Price v. Price, 46 L. T. N. S. 228.

Where a married woman, the donee of a general power of appointment by deed or will over insurance moneys payable upon her own death, united with her husband in settling certain family estates by an indenture which treated the moneys as the husband's own property, and settled them as such (she at the time not having any knowledge of the existence of her power over the moneys thus assigned), and she afterwards executed her will, whereby she devised and bequeathed the property over which she had any disposing power in trust for her five daughters and the issue of a deceased daughter,—by such will she exercised her general power, so as to make the policy money her own assets. Griffith-Boscawen v. Scott, L. R. 26 Ch. Div. 358, 53 L. J. Ch. N. S. 571, 50 L. T. N. S. 386, 32 Week. Rep. 580.

A married woman, being entitled to appoint by will a sum in 3-per-cent consolidated bank annuities, made her will whereby she gave a certain sum, but not the whole, of the bank annuities for the use and benefit of her daughter for life, and as the daughter should by her will appoint, and the daughter thereafter made her will, whereby she, by virtue of the power given to her by the will of her mother and of the original testator, and of every other power thereunto enabling, appointed and confirmed all sums in the public funds over which she had a disposing power, or to which she was entitled under either or any of the wills, or by any other means. It was held that the will of the mother, giving her daughter the power of appointment, was a valid exercise of the power given the mother under the will of the original testator, and that the same was exercised by the daughter by the appointment of the stock by her will. Philpott v. Turner, 9 Sim. 227, 2 Jur. 414.

In Bredell v. Collier, 40 Mo. 287, a woman who died a short time after the decease of her husband had a power of appointment under the will of her late husband, and thereafter she gave the entire property of which she might die possessed, wherever situate, real, personal, and mixed, including any and all rights acquired by her under the will of her late husband, to her mother to enjoy the sole and entire use of the same during her life. It was contended that this will did not execute the power given to her by her husband of the right to dispose of one half of his property by testamentary disposal; but the court held it amounted to, and must be holden, a valid and operative execution of the power.

Where a testator gave and bequeathed to his wife all his property, real and personal, to have and to hold during her life, and to will to her children as she thought proper at her death, a will executed by the wife, stated to be in pursuance and in execution of the power, which gives to all the children, but in unequal shares, the property so bequeathed, is a valid execution by the wife of the power of appointment conferred upon her by the will of her husband. Alder v. Jones (Md.) 56 Atl. 487.

In Heyer v. Burger, Hoffm. Ch. 1, it was held that an objection that a testator did not exercise a power of appointment given to him because his will did not refer to the power was untenable. (Probably under the New York statute, providing that a general devise is an exercise of the power, unless a contrary intention appears.)

generally, it shall be construed in relation to his interest, and not to his authority."

Andrews v. Emmot, 2 Bro. Ch. 297, is a leading case upon this subject. By a marriage settlement certain bank annuities were conveyed to trustees in trust for certain purposes and in trust, after the decease of John Andrews and his wife, if there should be no child, to transfer the trust fund to such persons as the said John Andrews should by deed or will appoint. John Andrews by his will, after giving sundry legacies, bequeathed, after the death of his wife, "all the rest and residue of his monies, and securities for money, goods, chattels, and personal estates, whatsoever and wheresoever, and of what nature, kind, or quality soever . . . to John Emmot." The master of the rolls, after quoting the above citation from Parker v. Kett, said: "If one applies this doctrine to the present case, the testator has not referred to the power, but has done the act generally; and he had property of which he could dispose. . . . The testator has not described anything. All his expressions will refer to his own property." Held, that the will of John Andrews was not an execution of the power. Upon appeal the decree below was affirmed; the lord chancellor, holding that the power was not executed by the will of John Andrews, saying: "It is necessary, in order to do this, that he should, by his will, notify his intention to do it [execute the power]. It is too late now to expect that a testator, in order to execute a power, shall make an ment by will made her will, taking notice that she had such power, and then bequeathed to her husband all the profits and revenues of her estates for his natural life, and, after his death, gave and bequeathed the estates to her children, if any; but in case she left no child or children, or the issue of such, after the decease of her husband, she gave and bequeathed the same to a third person, making him sole heir in default of issue left by her after the death of her husband; and a daughter was afterwards born to her, and she died shortly afterwards; and the daughter died an infant, without issue,—it was held that the power was properly exercised, and that the infant daughter took an estate tail, and the other person a remainder in fee. Southby v. Stonehouse, 2 Ves. Sr. 610.

Where the will of the donee of a power under her father's will declared that it was her intention to carry into effect the power reserved to her by the will of her father, and gave her estate in trust to pay her god-daughter a certain sum for life, and the rest of the income to the testatrix's husband during his life, and after his death the principal sum to be held in trust for such persons as the husband by will might declare; and the husband died in her lifetime; and thereafter, by a codicil to her will, after several specific bequests, she gave all the rest of her property to be equally divided between the brothers and sisters of the god-daughter without prejudice to the legacy of the latter,—it was held that there was no difficulty if such will and codicil could be regarded as an entire instrument, and that they must be so regarded; that the objection that the codicil speaks only of her own property, and makes no mention of the power, is annulled when the codicil and will are read together, and especially when it is observed that the bequests in the will itself are all of the testatrix's own property, although her declared intent was to execute the power, and she had no property of her own beyond the life estate under her father's will. Clermontel's Estate, 12 Phila. 139.

Where a testator, by his will, devised a portion of his estate to his executors in trust to pay over to his son during his natural life the income, interest, rents, and profits thereof, and after his death in trust for the use of his issue living at his death, in such parts, shares, and proportions, or of such one or more of them, to the exclusion of another or others, for such estate or estates, in such manner and under such trusts, as he by a last will and testament might appoint; and, providing that any such provisions in favor of the issue be postponed during the widowhood of any wife of the son to the extent of the whole or any part of the accruing income after the death of the son, to such provision as the son might think proper, by will or testamentary act as aforesaid, to appoint and make for the use of any wife who might survive him,—a will of the son which gives to his wife and three girls "all money, property, etc., of any kind whatever, to which I am entitled from my father's estate," points unerringly to an execution of the power, and no other intention than that he intended thereby to devise the subject of the power can be fairly gained from such language, and the intent is clearly manifest, no property having come to him from his father's estate save that covered by the trust,—it was alike in class and description, and he, therefore, could have had but one intention. Moss v. Pennsylvania Co. 4 W. N. C. 358.

A husband, by his will, gave his residuary estate to his wife absolutely, forever; and by a codicil, dated two days afterwards, directed that, if she died without making a will, the remainder of his property should be equally divided among his brother's four children. After his death she, by her will, recited the will of her husband, and declared her purpose to dispose of all of his estate, and also all of her own estate; and, having thus declared her purpose, she proceeded, without making any distinction between his estate and her own, to dispose of the whole as if it had been hers alone; and it was held that she had done it in a manner sufficient to pass both. Davies v. Fisher, 5 Beav. 201, 11 L. J. Ch. N. S. 338, 6 Jur. 248. (In a note to this case it is stated that the statute of 7 Wm. IV., & 1 Vict. chap. 26, § 27, did not apply to the present case.)

By a settlement, power was given to the wife to dispose by will of a certain sum, part of certain funds, and, after the husband's death, of the residue of the funds. By a will recited to be by virtue of a power and the settlement, after further reciting that she had power to dispose of the amount named in the settlement, she gave certain legacies and annuities, and then directed, appointed, gave, and bequeathed express reference to it; because it has been determined that, if a man disposes of that over which he has a power in such a manner that it is impossible to impute to him any other intention but that of executing the power, the act done shall be an execution of the power."

In Roach v. Haynes (1803) 8 Ves. Jr. 584, Lord Chancellor Eldon held that a power of appointment was not executed by a general bequest of property described as "my estate and effects;" that such a bequest could pass only that in which the testator had an interest, and not that as to which she had merely an authority to appoint.

In Bradley v. Westcott (1807) 13 Ves. Jr. 445, Sir William Grant, master of rolls, all the rest, residue, and remainder of her money and of her personal estate for payment of debts and funeral expenses; and this was held to be an execution of her power as to the residue of the funds. Harvey v. Stracey, J. Drew. 73, 22 L. J. Ch. N. S. 23, 16 Jur. 771.

Where, by will, a testator declared that a sum should be disposed of in such manner and for such uses and purposes as his daughter might direct by any will or testament; and the sum had increased by changes of investment; and the daughter thereafter made her will, reciting that, under the will of her father, she was entitled to dispose of the sum mentioned, and that she, in the exercise of the power, appointed said sum then secured on mortgage,—naming the mortgage and estate upon which it was,—and any other moneys representing the sum, unto her trustees for certain trusts,—this was held to be a valid appointment, not only of the original amount, but it would include the fund and all additions to it. Leffevre v. Freeland, 24 Beav. 403.

A general bequest, in a will, of all of the testator's property, in which he not only gives, devises, and bequeaths, but directs, limits, and appoints, is a valid exercise of the power of appointment over some of the property. Pidgely v. Pidgely, 1 Colly. Ch. Cas. 255, 8 Jur. 529.

Where certain stock was, by a will, bequeathed to one for life, and after his death upon trust to pay to any wife with whom he might intermarry, who should survive him, so much of the income of a designated part of such stock for her life as he should by deed or last will appoint, a will whereby the donee of the power bequeathed the residue of his estate belonging to him at the time of his decease, or over which he might have any power of disposition or control, to his wife, her heirs, assigns, and legal representatives, forever in full property, is a valid execution of the power, but conveys to the wife only a life estate. Re Teape, L. R. 16 Eq. 442, 43 L. J. Ch. N. S. 87, 28 L. T. N. S. 799, 21 Week. Rep. 780.

Where a married woman, by her marriage settlement, had the power to appoint a sum certain, which sum was to be raised upon a trust for that purpose, and to be paid and applied as she should by her will appoint; and she, by her will duly executed, after reciting the settlement and that she was desirous to exer-decided that a power of appointment was not executed by a bequest of "all my personal estate, money, securities for money, goods, chattels, and effects, whatsoever and wheresoever, and of what nature, kind, or quality soever, and all my estate and interest therein," and that said bequest was applicable only to the testator's own personal property.

To the same effect are Lovell v. Knight (1829) 3 Sim. 275, 1 L. J. Ch. N. S. 47, and Lempriere v. Valfy, 5 Sim. 108.

In Denn ex dem. Nowell v. Roake (1830) 6 Bing. 475, 1 Dow & C. 437, 4 Bligh N. R. 3, Alexander, C. B., in delivering to the House of Lords the unanimous opinion of the judges that the will of one Sarah Trymer did not operate as an execution of her power given her, thereby, in exercise of that power, gave and appointed the sum unto trustees, who were also executors of the will, and directed the original trustee to pay and apply the sum accordingly, and then bequeathed her personal estate to the same persons in trust, subject to her debts and legacies.—It was held that the sum was well appointed, and was a charge upon the estates of the settlement. Goodere v. Lloyd, 3 Sim. 538, 30 Revised Rep. 214.

Where, under a settlement, one has the power of appointment of certain funds to five persons or their respective issue, in such parts, shares, or proportions as the donee of the power shall by will appoint; and by her will she gives legacies of partially nominal sums to three of such persons, and all the residue of her property of whatever kind and wheresoever situate, and over which she had any power of appointment or disposition, to the other two,—such a will is a valid execution of the power. Gainsford v. Dunn, L. R. 17 Eq. 405, 43 L. J. Ch. N. S. 403, 30 L. T. N. S. 283, 22 Week. Rep. 499.

Where a person, by a family settlement, gave to his son certain funds for life, or until he should become bankrupt, with the power of appointment among his children, subject to a life interest in his wife during widowhood; and, having theretofore executed a will by which he bequeathed to trustees certain other funds to his said son for life, with power, if he should die leaving a widow surviving him, by his last will and testament to bequeath or appoint the dividends or income of the said trust moneys so bequeathed in trust for him to his widow, or for her benefit, for the whole or any part of her life; and the son by his will gave all his property over which he had any disposing power to his wife and two other trustees, to pay the income thereof to his wife during her life, and thereafter to his children.—It was held that, inasmuch as he gave all his property over which he had any disposing power, that included the power under both the settlement and the will, and, therefore, that both were well exercised. Thornton v. Thornton, L. R. 20 Eq. 599.

A testator, by his will, appointed his two sisters executrices thereof, and gave all the real and personal property of which he might die seised, or to which he might be entitled, to them in trust, and, after the death of one, power to dispose of certain real estate by her will, said: "There are many cases upon this subject, and there is hardly any subject upon which the principles appear to have been stated with more uniformity or acted upon with more consistency. They begin with Clere's Case in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, to be found in the sixth report [6 Coke, 176] and are continued down to the present time; and I may venture to say that in no instance has a power or authority been considered as executed, unless by some reference to the power or authority, or to the property which was the subject of it, or unless the provision made by the person intrusted with the power would have been ineffectual,—would have had nothing to operate upon, except it were considered as an execution of such power or authority. In this case there is no reference to the power, there is no reference to the subject of the power, and there is sufficient estate to answer the devise without calling in the aid of the undivided moiety now in question. . . . It is said that the present is a question of intention, and so, perhaps, it is. But there are many cases of intention, where the rules by which the intention is to be ascertained are fixed and settled. It would be extremely dangerous to depart from these rules in favor of loose speculation respecting intention in a particular case. It is, therefore, that the wisest judges have thought proper to adhere to the rules I have mentioned, in opposition to

to the survivor in trust, thereafter to be divided between his nephews and nieces, or the child or children of such as might then be dead. In such shares and proportions as his surviving sister should by her will direct and appoint. One of the sisters died, and the other, by her will, after appointing trustees, devised, appointed, and bequeathed all the real and personal estate of which she might be seised or possessed, or over which she might have any testamentary power of disposition, unto her trustees to sell, and convert into money such parts thereof as should not consist of money, and receive such parts as did consist of money, and stand possessed of the moneys upon trust to be paid and distributed as therein directed. It was held that, having referred to the testamentary power of disposition which she might have, and there being no other than the special power limited in her brother's will, the conclusion must be inevitable that she intended to exercise that power, which was the only testamentary power of disposition which she had. Re Swinburne, L. R. 27 Ch. Div. 696, 54 L. J. Ch. N. S. 329, 33 Week. Rep. 394.

A will which recites a power of appointment, and purports to exercise such power, is revoked by a subsequent will which contains no clause of revocation and no reference to the power, but which purports to "give, devise, bequeath, and appoint" all the real and personal estate of the testator, as the word "appoint" is, under the circumstances, a sufficient exercise of the power. Kent v. Kent [1902] P. 108, 71 L. J. Prob. N. S. 50, 86 L. T. N. S. 536.

Where a man had a power of appointment, by will, among his eight children, four of whom predeceased him, whereby their shares in the estate descended to him as their heir at law, a devise in his will that all the estate over which he might have any power of appointment by will should go according to the limitation therein mentioned passed his moiety derived as the heir at law of the four deceased children; and that portion of the estate will not descend to his heirs. Atherton v. Langford, 25 Beav. 5.

A settlement had been made which contained no power of charging in favor of younger children. Twenty years thereafter a resettlement was made, which contained a power to the tenant for life to charge the hereditaments with sums not exceeding a gross sum mentioned for the portion of his younger children. The person possessed of such power, by his will, proceeded to say that whereas, under the settlement made in the year,—mentioning the first settlement,—he was empowered to charge, etc., and then proceeded to direct by his said will the disposition of the gross sum mentioned in the later settlement. This was held to be a good exercise of the power which he possessed under the resettlement; and the fact that he, in his preamble, referred to the original settlement, which did not contain the power, made no difference. Re Wilmot, 29 Beav. 644.

A testator having a power of appointment of a sum of money, by his will gave portions of it to various legatees, and in doing so stated that he had the disposal of the sum, but made no other reference to the power of appointment given by the settlement, and thereafter made a residuary bequest which made no reference to the power. This was held to be an exercise of the power with respect to the remainder of the sum, the court saying that it was a case in which the testator had clearly and distinctly referred to the power, and indicated his intention to dispose of the property subject to it, and it was as if he had said that he intended to dispose of the principal sum over which he had a power of disposal, and that he did dispose of it as appeared by his will. Re Comber, 11 Jur. N. S. 968, 13 L. T. N. S. 459, 14 Week. Rep. 172.

Where a married woman, who, by her marriage settlement, had a general power of appointment by will over a fund, executed her will, which she declared to be her will and appointment, as well of all the estates and property comprised in her marriage settlement as of all other property of which she might be seised or possessed; and gave a portion of the fund in favor of one and his children; and provided that, in default of children, such portion should fall into her general personal property and pass to her residuary legatee and appointee; and, after making certain specific bequests, she proceeded to appoint her sister her residuary legatee and appointee,—this was held to be a valid exercise of the power of appointment of the surplus of the trust fund over and above the portion appointed to the person named, and his children. Re De Lusi, Ir. L. R. 3 Eq. 232. The vice chancellor said that the question was whether, under the circumstances, he must not treat this as a gift of two small sums out of specific stock, and a specific what they evidently thought the probable intention in the particular case before them."

Sir Edward Sugden, in his admirable work on Powers (vol. 1, p. 385, [3d Am. ed. *369]) uses this language: "It is firmly settled that a mere general devise or bequest, however unlimited in terms, will not comprehend the subject of the power, unless it refer to the subject, or to the power itself, or generally to any power vested in the testator."

The rules of the common law in respect to the execution of powers were changed by stat. 1 Vict. chap. 26, § 27, passed in 1837, which provided that a general devise of the real estate of the testator should be construed to include all real estate over which such testator may have had a power of appointment, and should operate as the execution of such power, unless a contrary intention should appear by the will, and that a bequest of personal estate in like general words should operate as the execution of such power under similar circumstances.

The leading American case is Blagge v. Miles (1841) 1 Story, 426, Fed. Cas. No. 1,479, in which Judge Story says: "It is now admitted to be established, as the general rule, that the intention of the testator is the pole star to direct the court in the interpretation of wills. . . . Similar doctrines now generally prevail in regard to the execution of powers, and especially in regard to their execution by last wills and testaments. . . . The intention to gift of the residue of such stock, together with all other property of the testatrix, to the sister who was the residuary legatee. That the distinction was a very nice one; but he was of opinion that he was justified in holding the terms to be sufficient to constitute a specific disposition of an existing fund, and that, the testatrix having had no property of her own answering the description, the bequest must be taken to have been intended as an execution of the power.

A testator by his will gave his wife a power of appointment over a sum in bank stock and another sum secured by a mortgage, in favor of the children of her two brothers who should be alive at her decease, excepting the one who should inherit a certain estate. By a codicil to his will he recalled the exception, and, after his death, his wife, by her will, after reciting that she was possessed of the bank stock and various other property, gave all her said property to her executors upon trust, for her nephews and nieces therein named, who were objects of the power; and in another portion of her will she recited the power, given by the will of her husband, to appoint the sum secured by mortgage to her nephews and nieces, and gave such sum to them equally, but did not make any reference to the codicil of her husband's will. This was held to be a good exercise of the power as to both funds. Saunders v. Carden, Ir. L. R. 27 Eq. 48.

Where a testatrix, who had a testamentary power of appointing a share of personal estate among her nephews and nieces, and who had no other power of appointment, made her will containing the following: "I appoint, devise, and bequeath my real estate and the residue of my personal estate to my trustees upon trust to sell or convert the same into money, and to pay and divide the proceeds (after paying my debts, funeral and testamentary expenses) equally between," four named nephews and nieces, "or such of them as shall be living at my decease;" and the four nephews and nieces survived the testatrix, the limited power of appointment was exercised. The court said that the use of the word "appoint" is significant in the will of a person having a testamentary power of appointment, as it is a word of art prima facie having reference to powers only, and cited, approved, and followed Re Teape, L. R. 16 Eq. 442, 43 L. J. Ch. N. S. 87, 28 L. T. N. S. 799, 21 Week. Rep. 780, and Re Swin- 64 L. R. A.

burne, L. R. 27 Ch. Div. 696, 54 L. J. Ch. N. S. 229, 83 Week. Rep. 394, and dissented from what was held to be a dictum of Chatterton. V. C., in Re Richardson, Ir. L. R. 17 Eq. 436, infra, I. d., 1. Re Mayhew [1901] 1 Ch. 677, 70 L. J. Ch. N. S. 428, 84 L. T. N. S. 761, 49 Week. Rep. 330.

Where one having a power of appointment by will executed her will, in which she referred to the property which was the subject of the power, and in terms exercised the power as to it, and in another part of her will stated that, subject to the payment of her debts and legacies thereinbefore given, she gave and bequeathed, and also, in exercise of all powers and authorities vested in her, directed and appointed, all her personal estate and effects whatsoever and wheresoever,—it was held that the property which was embraced in the power, but not sufficiently referred to in the first bequest, passed by the subsequent portion of the will. Maunsell v. Maunsell, 24 L. T. N. S. 698, 19 Week. Rep. 1003.

By his will a testator conferred two general powers of appointment upon his children, and thereafter declared that, notwithstanding the trust thereinbefore declared in favor of the issue of his daughters, it should be lawful for each of them, when married, by will or codicil to appoint that all or any part of the income of her original and accruing share or shares should, from and after her death, be paid to her husband for his life or any less period, and upon such conditions and with such restrictions as she should see fit to impose. One of the daughters married and made her will, whereby she gave, devised, and bequeathed all her real and personal estate, and appointed all real and personal estate over which she might have a power of appointment, unto her husband absolutely. It was held that she had clearly expressed her intention of exercising every power she had in favor of her husband, and that the limited power was thereby exercised, and the husband took a life estate under the appointment. Re Sharland [1899] 2 Ch. 536, 68 L. J. Ch. N. S. 747, 81 L. T. N. S. 384.

A will, though insufficient to pass real estate, where it affects to exercise the power of appointment, will be good to pass personal property. Duff v. Dalzell, 1 Bro. Ch. 147.

Where, by articles for settlement of the wife's real and leasehold estates, the husband had power to appoint her estates to the chilexecute the power must be apparent and clear, so that the transaction is not fairly susceptible of any other interpretation. If it be doubtful under all the circumstances, then that doubt will prevent it from being deemed an execution of the power. . . . Three classes of cases have been held to be sufficient demonstrations of an intended execution of the power: (1) Where there has been some reference in the will, or other instrument, to the power; (2) or a reference to the property, which is the subject on which it is to be executed; (3) or where the provision in the will or other instrument, executed by the donee of the power, would otherwise be ineffectual, or a mere nullity,—in other words, it would have no operation, except as an execution of the power."

The rule thus stated was referred to with approval by the Supreme Court of the United States in Blake v. Hawkins, 98 U. S. 315, 396, 25 L. ed. 139, and Lee v. Simpson, 134 U. S. 572, 590, 33 L. ed. 1038, 1046, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 631. In many of the states the common-law rules as to the execution of powers have been altered by statutes similar to that of statute 1 Vict.; but, where not so altered, with very few exceptions, said rules appear to be in force in this country.

In Maryland a statute of this character was adopted in 1888; but prior to that time it was uniformly held that the intention to execute a power of appointment by will dren of the marriage in such manner and form as he should by deed or will appoint, and by other articles of the same deed for the settlement of his own real estates he had an absolute power of appointment over them by deed or will in default of issue of the marriage, and there were children of the marriage, and no settlement was ever made pursuant to the articles; and the husband, who died in the lifetime of the wife, by his will, after reciting the articles for the settlement of his own estates and confirming them, and reciting the power of appointment in them at length, mentioning it as a power which he intended to exercise by his will, also, in exercise of that power and all other powers, appointed his own real estates, and all other real estates over which he had power, to trustees for a term upon trust to raise portions for his younger children, and there was no allusion in any part of his will to the articles for the settlement of his wife's estate, but he directed therein that all persons taking any benefit under his will should be bound by the doctrine of election to give effect to every disposition contained in it,—his will operated as an appointment of the wife's real estates; and the words, "in such manner and form," authorized him to give equitable interests to the children. Trollope v. Linton, 1 Sim. & Stu. 477, 21 L. J. Ch. N. S. 3, 24 Revised Rep. 211.

By a settlement made on marriage, the wife assigned to trustees all her personal estate upon trust after the death of herself and her husband, and, in default of children of the marriage (which happened), to pay the trust moneys to such persons as the wife by deed or will should appoint, and, in default, upon trust to pay one half of the trust moneys to such part to his sister. Thereafter the wife's mother, by her will, gave her daughter a life interest in considerable property, and after her decease the same was to be held in trust to pay one half of the trust moneys to such person as her daughter, the wife, by deed or will, should appoint, and, in default, to the children (if any) of her daughter, and, in default thereof, upon trust to pay the sum to the testatrix's grandchildren, being the same brother and sister above mentioned, in equal shares. The wife thereafter made her will, and, after referring to her powers, both under the settlement and the will of her mother, she appointed all the personal estate and effects which she had the power to dispose of to her executor upon trust to convert the same into money, and one moiety thereof she gave to her niece, the sister before mentioned, and the other moiety to the brother, absolutely,—the persons to whom both the estate mentioned in the settlement and also in the will of the wife's mother were to go in case of no appointment. The wife survived the husband, and there were no children of the marriage. The brother, to whom the one moiety had been bequeathed absolutely, died in the lifetime of his testatrix, the wife, whereby the bequest to him lapsed. It was held that the will of the wife was a valid appointment, under both the terms of the settlement and those of her mother's will. Chamberlain v. Hutchinson, 22 Beav. 444.

Where, by the terms of a marriage settlement, the husband had the power to limit an estate tail to his son, and the settlement provided for a certain sum per year to the wife; and by the same settlement the allowance for the maintenance and education of daughters was left in his power; and he made his will by which he gave all his estate and effects, real and personal, to his son, to whom he had the power to limit an estate tail; and, in making a provision for his daughters, he alluded to his wife's marriage settlement; and, in providing that the sum named in the settlement be paid yearly to his wife, again referred to the settlement,—it was held that upon the whole his will manifestly extended to his settled, as well as unsettled property, and was an execution of all the powers given him by the settlement. Hunloke v. Geil, 1 Russ. & M. 515.

Where a person possessed of a power of appointment made his will wherein he prefaced his devise thus: "By virtue of all and every power and powers, authority and authorities, enabling me thereto, I give and devise my estates,"—such devise was his will, and the devise therein contained was a valid exercise of his power of appointment, as no testator, who considered himself to be disposing only of estates strictly his own, ever used such language; and this preface manifested a plain intention to pass all estates which he could affect by virtue of any power which was vested in him. Bailey v. Lloyd, 5 Russ. Ch. 330, 7 L. J. Ch. 98, 29 Revised Rep. 30.

By indentures, certain freeholds were conveyed by two persons to the use of one of them for life, and after his decease to such of his must appear by a reference in the will to the power, or to the subject of it, or from the fact that the will would be inoperative without the aid of the power. Mory v. Michael (1861) 18 Md. 227; Foos v. Scarf (1880) 55 Md. 301; Cooper v. Haines (1889) 70 Md. 282, 17 Atl. 79.

The common-law rule was applied in New Jersey in the case of Meeker v. Breintnall (1884) 38 N. J. Eq. 345, and in Connecticut in the case of Hollister v. Shaw (1878) 46 Conn. 248.

In Massachusetts, in Amory v. Meredith, 7 Allen, 397, decided in 1863, the common-law rule was rejected, and the rule of statute 1 Vict. adopted, as more likely to accomplish the intention of persons having powers of appointment. The court says:

children for such shares, etc., as he by deed or will should appoint, and, in default, between them equally in tail, with ultimate remainder to the appointer in fee. Thereafter the person possessing the power of appointment by his will devised to the trustees all the real estates whatsoever and wheresoever of which he or any person or persons in trust for him, was seised or to which he was entitled, or any estate of freehold and inheritance, or of freehold only, in possession, reversion, remainder, or expectancy, or of which he had power to dispose or to appoint by this his will, to sell and hold the proceeds upon certain trusts for his children, who should attain the age of twenty-one, or die under that age, leaving issue living at their death, and, in default to his nephews. It appeared that there was no other property subject to the testator's power, and it was held that, as the will in fact professed to execute all powers, and the testator expressly referred to all his powers, and there was no other property subject to any power, it was as strong, almost, as if he had specified the property himself. The court said that this was a stronger case than Bailey v. Lloyd, 5 Russ. Ch. 330, 7 L. J. Ch. 98, 29 Revised Rep. 30, because in that case the testator had used the expression "my" real estate; and that in many cases it had been held that these words would not pass estates over which the testator had a mere power, for the power of disposing of property is very different from the ownership of it; and that the absence of that expression made this a much stronger case in favor of the execution of the power. Banks v. Banks, 17 Beav. 352, 1 W. R. 511.

Where, in a deed to trustees, the grantor, who had reserved to himself the power of appointing certain leasehold premises and other personal estate held by trustees of a previous deed, made his will, whereby, after making specific bequests and provisions, he gave, devised, and bequeathed all the real and personal estates and effects whatsoever and wheresoever, whether in possession, reversion, remainder, or expectancy, over which, at the time of his decease, he should have any beneficial disposing power by his will, to his trustees to sell and convert into money such parts of the residuary estate as should not consist of money, and appointed the same to his wife and children; and, by virtue of a power provided in the first deed, he revoked the appointment made by him in 64 L. R. A.

"We are aware of no decisions in this commonwealth, binding on us as an authority, which should compel us to adopt a rule of construction likely in a majority of cases to defeat the intention it is designed to ascertain and effectuate. Seeking for the intention of the testator, the rule of the English statute [1 Vict. chap. 26, § 27] appears to us the wiser and safer rule." This case was followed in the later Massachusetts cases, and also in New Hampshire. Emery v. Haven (1893) 67 N. H. 503, 35 Atl. 940.

In Pennsylvania the courts adhered to the old rule of construction until the adoption of the statute of 1879, which provided that "a bequest of the personal estate of the testator, or any bequest of personal property that deed with the effect that the income appointed therein might stand and be subject to the same power as if it had not been executed. —there were sufficient indications to satisfy the court judicially that the testator intended to exercise the power, and that it was exercised by the will. Von Brockdorff v. Malcolm, L. R. 30 Ch. Div. 172, 55 L. J. Ch. N. S. 121, 53 L. T. N. S. 263, 33 Week. Rep. 934.

Where a married woman, by a settlement made in contemplation of her marriage, is invested with a general power of appointment by her will, and she executes a will in all respects as required by the power, but which contains no reference to it, and thereby gives to her husband all the property which she may die possessed of, or have in reversion or in expectation, such a will is not a valid exercise of the power. Lemphiere v. Valpy, 5 Sim. 108.

Where one having a power over a sum of money, originally the property of his wife, but which by the marriage settlement he has a right to dispose of after the death of his wife, by his will, after giving several legacies, disposes of the residue to a certain person, such a will is not an execution of the power, the same not being alluded to in the will, and the will not containing anything by which there appears to be an intent on the part of the testator to exercise the power. Andrews v. Emmot, 2 Bro. Ch. 297.

Where certain stock was, by the terms of a will, given in trust, to pay the dividends thereof to the testator's son during his life, with the power after his death to transfer a part of the capital according to an appointment by the son, such a power of appointment was not exercised by a will of the son in which there was nothing that referred to the power, and nothing necessarily descriptive of the property over which it existed; and, therefore, whatever might have been the intention, the court said it was bound by the authorities to say that the testator did not mean to affect any property but what was his own. The will of the son, under which it was claimed he had exercised the power of appointment, bequeathed only seven eighths of the stock, and did not dispose of the residue, or appoint executors. The lord chancellor (Kildon) said he was not sure that the rule did not oblige the court to act against what might probably have been the intention nine times in ten, but that there was not in this will any reference whatever to the power, described in a general manner, shall be construed to include any personal estate or any personal estate to which such description shall extend as the case may be, which he may have power to appoint in any manner he may think proper, and shall operate as an execution of such power, unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will."

If this statute was applicable to the question before us, the will of Augustin S. Lane would, without doubt, be a valid execution of the power. But the donor of the power, Jesse Lane, being a citizen and resident of this state and his will a Delaware will, and the trustee a citizen and resident of this state, the question as to execution of the power is to be determined by the law of this state, and not by the law of Pennsylvania, the domicil of Augustin S. Lane.

Questions as to the execution of a power of appointment of personal property are to be decided by the law of the domicil of the donor of the power, and not by the law of the domicil of the donee of the power. This was conceded in the argument of the counsel of the defendants, and is abundantly established by authority in this country and in England. Cotting v. De Sartiges, 17 R. I. 669, 16 L. R. A. 307, 24 Atl. 530; Sevall v. Wilmer, 132 Mass. 131; Bingham's Appeal, 64 Pa. 345; Pouey v. Hordern [1900] 1 Ch. 492, 69 L. J. Ch. N. S. 231, 82 L. T. N. S. 51; Hernando v. Sawtell, L. and nothing having a reference to it, or that could be stated as having any reference, except the words which designated the stock by name; that if when he died he had not had any stock, but had other personal estate, that stock must have been purchased for the legatees; and that it operated only as a direction to purchase stock if he died without any; and that it was difficult to say that what would amount to that direction in a will was to be construed into a gift of that which was not his to give, but over which he had a power. Nannock v. Horton, 7 Ves. Jr. 398.

Where a testatrix, having a power of appointment among her children by will, made her will and appointed it to a son and daughter in moieties, and afterwards executed another will revoking all former wills made by her, without special reference to the particular will and appointment, and devised and bequeathed all her real and personal estate to her daughter absolutely, and her son died in her lifetime leaving one child, the first will was revoked by the second, and the power was not exercised by the latter. Harvey v. Harvey, 32 L. T. N. S. 141, 23 Week. Rep. 478.

An intent to execute a power of appointment does not appear in a will which makes no reference to the power, although the bequests somewhat exceed the amount of the testator's estate, and his relations with the donor are so intimate as to raise a presumption that he knew of the power. Cotting v. De Sartiges, 17 R. I. 669, 16 L. R. A. 307, 24 Atl. 530.

Where a widow having the power, under her husband's will, to dispose of real estate in a particular manner, devises the same in a different manner; and her will contains no reference whatever, in terms, to the will of her husband, or to the right or power conferred upon her by it, or to the subject-matter of the power, which clearly and unequivocally indicates, without any doubt or uncertainty, no intention on her part to execute the power delegated, or to act under the will of her husband in disposing as she has of the premises, but invariably speaks of the land as her own, and devises and disposes of it in the same manner and in the same language as if it belonged to her in her own right,—the court will not say that it is her intention to execute it in the manner which her husband's will required, which intention must always appear in the execution of such a power, either by a reference to the power itself, or by some relation to the subject-matter of it, in a way which can leave no doubt of the intention to execute it. Doe ex dem. Davis v. Vincent, 1 Houst. (Del.) 416.

When one, having a life estate under a will, with power by his will to appoint to any wife of his, for and during the term of her natural life, or any lesser term, and from and after her or his decease, in case he shall not have made such appointment to her, or so far as the same shall not extend, then upon certain trusts for the benefit of his children and grandchildren as he shall by deed appoint, and, in default, for the benefit of his children or child, having no real estate of his own, by his will devised and bequeathed all his real and personal estate to his wife absolutely,—the will, containing no reference to the special power or to the property affected by it, will not operate as an exercise of the power. Re Williams, L. R. 42 Ch. Div. 93, 58 L. J. Ch. N. S. 451, 61 L. T. N. S. 58. One of the judges said that it was a special power, and that § 27 of the wills act, which deals with general powers of appointment, did not apply.

c. Reference in donee's will to property the subject of the power.

Although the donee of a power of appointment failed to mention or refer to the same in the will by which it was claimed he had executed it, yet, if he, in his will, referred to the property, interest, or estate which was the subject of the power in such manner as clearly to show his intention to exercise it, he will be deemed to have done so.

Where a will devises or bequeaths described real estate or specific personal estate which is the identical subject of the power, in such case the power is deemed executed by the will, although not specifically referred to therein. Pep- per's Will, 1 Par. Sel. Eq. Cas. 436.

Where a married woman by a marriage settlement conveyed lands to the use of herself for life, and, under the circumstances detailed in the settlement, for the use of such persons and for such estates as she should, notwithstanding her coverture, by will appoint; and she executed her will, in and by which she de-

The only reported case in this state as to the execution of a power of appointment is Doe ex dem. Davis v. Vincent, 1 Houst. (Del.) 416, decided by the superior court in 1857. By the will of John Goslin power was given to his widow by her will "to devise the estate, both real and personal, to their children, or their proper heirs, as she might deem right and equal in her best judgment, which should be final." By her will she provided as follows: "My executors, hereinafter named, shall advertise and sell at public sale all of my real estate." The court held that she was not authorized by her husband's will to direct a sale of the property, and that there was, therefore, no valid execution of the power. After alluding to the fact that the will of the widow contained no reference to the will of her husband, or to the right of power conferred by it, or to the subject-matter of the power, and that in her will she invariably speaks of the land as her own, the court adds: "We therefore cannot say that we are satisfied, in addition to the other objections raised to the execution of the power delegated, that it was the intention of Mrs. Goslin to execute it in the manner which her husband's will required, and which intention must always appear in the execution of such a power, either by a reference to the power itself, or by some relation to the subject-matter of it, in a way which can leave vised the lands, speaking of them as "my" lands,—it was held that this was a good devise of the lands under the power of appointment, and that the use of the word "my" must not be construed as an intention on her part to dispose of the same by virtue of any claimed ownership; but, inasmuch as the lands were originally hers, and the instrument could not operate as a will on account of her incapacity by coverture, it must be held to be an execution of the power, and the word "my" simply perfected the description, as they were in effect her lands. Churchill v. Dibben, 2 Ld. Kenyon, pt. 2, p. 68, 9 Sim. 447, note.

A gift of the whole of the residue of her property, by a testatrix having the power of appointment of certain property of which she is tenant for life, and having property of her own, except her freehold property, such excepted property being part of the subject of the power, passes the residue of the property subject to the power. The very fact of such exception shows that the intention of the testatrix was to exercise the power over such residue. Reid v. Reid, 25 Beav. 469.

If the donee of a power of appointment intends to execute it, and the mode is in other respects unexceptional, that intention, however manifest, whether directly or indirectly, positively or by just implication, will make the execution valid and operative; and so the power given by a will to dispose of, by will, a bequest of three fourths of a bond and mortgage, the enjoyment of which for life is bequeathed to the donee of the power, is properly executed by the will of the donee, which, after referring to the bequest, devises and bequeaths the entire property and estate to which she is "in any wise entitled," to her husband. Lee v. Simpson, 134 U. S. 572, 33 L. ed. 1038, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 631, Affirming 39 Fed. 235.

An avowal by a testatrix in the introductory clause of her will, of her purpose thereby to execute a power of appointment possessed by her, is not of itself an execution of the power, and is important only as it may shed light upon the subsequent dispositions. To determine whether a power of appointment is well executed by a will the intention of such execution must be sought for through the whole instrument; and, although a will be expressed to be made in pursuance of a power, yet, if the testator appears to dispose of his own property only, the power will not be executed by the will. On the other hand, if the will contains no express intention to exercise the power, yet, if it may be reasonably gathered from the gifts and directions made that the purpose and object were to execute it, the will must be regarded as an execution of the power. Blake v. Hawkins, 98 U. S. 315, 25 L. ed. 139.

Where a sum was given by a will to the wife of the testator for life with the power of disposing of two thirds of it at her death by will or otherwise, and she executed her will leaving the amount named in the will of her husband to the child and grandchildren of her deceased husband, and then gave all the rest and residue of her personal property to her brother and his daughter and another relative, she being possessed in her own right of a sum slightly larger than the sum over which she had the power of appointment; and then stated that the personal property bequeathed to her by her late husband remained in the hands of the executor, naming him, and that, by the terms of her husband's will, she was entitled to the full life estate in the same,—such reference by her in her will to the amount in the hands of the executor of her husband's will was a sufficient reference to the subject of the power, contained in the will of her husband, for the purpose of disposing of the same under her will. Cooper v. Haines, 70 Md. 282, 17 Atl. 79.

Where a testator gave to his wife a sum certain, to be used by her during her natural life, and gave her the power to appoint the same among the legatees in his will after her decease according to her judgment and discretion, the will of the wife, in which she recognizes some of the legatees in her husband's will in such a manner as shows that it is her intention to execute the power of appointment given to her by his will, is a good exercise of such power, as it is not necessary that such intention should appear by express terms or recitals in the instrument. It is sufficient if the act shows that the donee had in view the subject of the power, and the fact that by her will she distributed among such legatees of her husband the exact amount left to her for life is an additional evidence of such intention. Munson v. Berdan, 35 N. J. Eq. 376.

Where the subject over which a power of appointment has been created is particularly described in a will of a testatrix possessed of no doubt of the intention to execute the power."

While the first ground of objection was sufficient, the latter were equally applicable and conclusive, and cannot properly be treated as obiter. We regard this case as a distinct recognition of the binding force in this state of the common-law rules relating to the execution of powers. In the absence of any decision upon the subject in this state, we should feel obliged to adopt the common-law rule of construction, as the practice here has been quite uniform to adhere to the common law until altered by statute, and especially so in matters relating to title to property. Olawson v. Primrose, 4 Del. Ch. 643.

Applying the settled common-law rules of construction to the will of Augustin S. Lane, we have no difficulty in reaching the conclusion that it was not an execution of his power of appointment. It certainly cannot be said of this will that the intention to execute the power is apparent and clear, and that it is not fairly susceptible of any other interpretation. It is at least doubtful, under all the circumstances, and that doubt is sufficient to prevent it from being decreed an execution of the power. Blagge v. Miles, (1841) 1 Story, 426, Fed. Cas. No. 1,479. There is nothing in the will, or in the circumstances of the testator, his family, or estate, so far as they are known to us, to indicate that it was his intention to execute the power. He designates the property bequeathed by him as "all my estate, the power, it is a valid exercise thereof, although it does not refer to the power in terms. Drusadow v. Wilde, 63 Pa. 170.

Where a testator conveyed certain real estate, describing it, to his wife for life, the same to be disposed of at the pleasure of the wife at her death, her will devising the particular real estate, although it does not recite the power, is a valid exercise of the same. Dillon v. Faloon, 158 Pa. 468, 27 Atl. 1082.

Where the will of a wife having a power of appointment alludes to the property bequeathed as belonging to her, but the property disposed of is the subject of the power of appointment, that fact manifests her intention to execute the power, as no express evidence of such an intention is necessary. Hood v. Haden, 82 Va. 588.

Where by a marriage settlement the husband was clothed with the power of appointment of a moiety of lands of which his wife's father was seised at the time of the settlement, and he assumed to exercise the power by will, it was held that whether the will was or was not an execution of the power was a question of intention to be gathered from the will itself; and as, in this case, the will referred directly to the land or farm by its well-known name, it was held to be such a direct reference to the subject of the power as was sufficient to make it good as an appointment, even although it might be bad as a devise. Dillon v. Dillon, 1 Ball & B. 77.

A will which refers to and describes stock over which the testator has the power of appointment is a valid appointment, although the power is not referred to. Sayer v. Sayer, 7 Hare, 377, 18 L. J. Ch. N. S. 274, 13 Jur. 402, Affirmed in 3 Macn. & G. 606, 21 L. J. Ch. N. S. 190, 16 Jur. 21.

A devise of land, describing it by its commonly used name, over which the testator has the power of appointment, is a good exercise of the power, although the power itself is nowhere referred to in the will. Crosier v. Crosier, 3 Drury & Warren, 373, 2 Connor & L. 309, 5 Ir. Eq. Rep. 415.

A man upon his marriage declared that his estate should be chargeable with a sum for the benefit of younger children; and, his wife having an estate of her own, she and her husband after marriage levied a fine of it, and the uses declared were, that they should have a power by any deed or writing, or by last will, 64 L. R. A.

to appoint and divide the estate among their younger children in such proportions as they, or the survivor, should think proper. The husband survived, and by his will gave his daughter a certain amount which he declared should be in lieu and in full satisfaction of the amount covenanted to be raised out of his own estate, and charged the whole amount so given his daughter upon his wife's estate, intending thereby to execute his power. This was held by Lord Chancellor Hardwicke to be a substantial execution of the power, because, while it was true that the terms of the power were not pursued, the intent and design of it were; that it was conceded that the father might have appointed part of the estate to be sold, and the money raised by such sale; and that what he did was exactly the same thing; so the court might order the sale. Roberts v. Dixall, 2 Eq. Cas. Abr. 668.

One who makes a settlement of lands to the use of himself for life, with remainder to such of his four children, and in such amounts and proportions, as he shall by any writing appoint, may exercise such power of appointment by devising a rent charge out of the lands and direct the payment of sums of money to the daughters as alternative conditions, and it is not necessary that the land be distributed in specie. Thwaytes v. Dye, 2 Vern. 80.

If one has a power to charge an estate, it is not necessary, in the execution of it, that he should refer to the deed out of which the power arises, for in a court of equity it is enough that his intent appears; and if, in the execution, he sufficiently describes the estate he has the power to charge, the estate is certainly bound,—especially where the person charging is a purchaser of the power. Probert v. Morgan, 1 Atk. 441.

A person who was a prebendary was in the habit of demising the prebendal estate to one of his children for twenty-one years, and the child that was named as lessee always executed a declaration of trust declaring that his or her name was made use of in the lease in trust for the father for so many years of the term as he should live, and then for such person or persons as he should by deed or will appoint, and, in default thereof, to and among all his children equally; and such lessees generally surrendered the lease yearly and the owner granted a new one. He leased the prebendal estate to his daughter, who executed the usual real and personal, of whatever kind and wheresoever situate." While he was entitled to the income of the trust fund during his life, and had the right to dispose of it by his will, it was not, in any proper sense, his estate, or any part of his estate.

The words, "of whatever kind and wheresoever situate," do not in any degree enlarge the meaning or operation of the words "all my estate." In Andrews v. Emmot, 2 Bro. Ch. 297, and Bradley v. Westcott (1807) 13 Ves. Jr. 445, similar, and even stronger, superadded words were held to have no such effect. The words "all my estate," "my estate," and "estate," as they occur in the latter part of the second item and in the third item of the will, obviously refer to what the testator had already bequeathed, viz., his own property, and not to that as to which he had only a power of appointment.

This will does not allude to the will creating the power, or to the power, or to the trust fund, the subject of the power. If the operation of the will be limited to the testator's own estate, it will not be ineffectual, as he had at the time of his decease a personal estate the income of which was abundantly sufficient to pay the annuity of $1,200 for his wife and to support and educate his son during his minority.

We are therefore of the opinion that the decree of the chancellor should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

declaration of trust. In the same year he made his will, in which he, after giving some legacies, bequeathed to his eldest son all the rest of his goods, chattels, and estates, whether real or personal, in possession and reversion, and made him executor, and then, by a supplemental clause, stated that it was his will that such eldest son should have the disposal of the estate of the prebend, and receive all the profits and advantages arising and accruing from it. Thereafter new leases were made as formerly, yearly, until the subsisting lease, which was made in September, and the testator died the following April. It was held that the will executed in favor of the son was a good execution of the power reserved in the lease. Carte v. Carte, 3 Atk. 174, Ridgeway, 210, 1 Amb. 28.

Where a husband before marriage gave a bond conditioned to enable his intended wife to dispose of her freehold estate by deed or will, and she exercised the power by will made during her coverture, whereby she devised her estate to her younger children in fee, it was a good exercise of the power, and such younger children may maintain a bill against the heir for a conveyance of the estate. Rippon v. Dawling, 2 Amb. 565.

It is not necessary, in order to execute a power, to make an express reference to it. If one disposes of that over which he has a power in such a manner that it is impossible to impute to him any other intention than that of executing the power, the act done will be an execution of it. Andrews v. Emmot, 2 Bro. Ch. 297.

A power of appointing real estate is well executed by a will containing a devise to trustees to sell, and indicating the manner in which they shall dispose of the money produced by the sale. Kenworthy v. Bate, 6 Ves. Jr. 793, 6 Revised Rep. 46.

By indentures previous to a marriage equal sums provided by the intended husband and wife were directed to be laid out in stock upon trust for the husband for life, and after his decease to the wife for life, and, after the decease of the survivor, the same were to be transferred to and among such child or children of the marriage as the husband should by deed or will direct or appoint. After the marriage the sums so advanced by either, which had not been laid out in stock, were laid out in the purchase of an estate known by a designated name. Thereafter the husband declared, by his will, that the estate should be sold after his wife's death, and the money arising from the same paid out as therein directed, and this was held to be a valid exercise of his power of appointment. Long v. Long, 5 Ves. Jr. 445, 5 Revised Rep. 101.

By a marriage settlement a sum of stock was settled upon the wife for life, and after her decease in trust for all and every, or such one or more of her children as she should by deed or will appoint; and by her will the wife appointed the whole fund to trustees upon trust for $1,200, to pay the income to a son for life, and after his death for his children, and, if he should die without children, then that the sum should be added to, and form part of, the residue of the trust estate; and the trusts of the remainder of the stock were in favor of daughters for life, with testamentary powers; and the son to whom the special sum had been left as aforesaid died leaving children. It being admitted that the gift to his children was excessive, it was held that on his death the sum left in trust for him was not undisposed of, but was well appointed to the daughters by the residuary gift. Re Meredith, L. R. 3 Ch. Div. 757, 25 Week. Rep. 107.

Where a testator under a settlement had a special power to appoint, by will, two estates designated by name, and by his will he devised each of those estates by name as his property, he having no property in the places indicated by the names of the two estates, such a devise was an exercise of the power of appointment, and will pass those estates. Re Wait, L. R. 30 Ch. Div. 617, 54 L. J. Ch. N. S. 1172, 53 L. T. N. S. 336, 83 Week. Rep. 930.

The will of one having a life interest in a sum of money invested in government funds, which bequeaths all the money belonging to her in such funds with the dividends thereon, and all other money she may die possessed of, is a valid exercise of the power of appointment, as the inference is that she applied the words to the stock on which she received the dividends. Re Gratwick, L. R. 1 Eq. 177, 11 Jur. N. S. 919, 5 Beav. 215.

Where a man made a settlement upon his children of certain schedule property, and a demand of a certain amount which he held against the husband of one of his daughters as the subjects of that settlement, and reserved in the settlement a power of appointment of the subjects thereof by will, and thereafter made his will, whereby he bequeathed the residue of his estate unto trustees to pay the income of the sum to his daughters in trust, and the share of each to such person as she might by deed or will appoint,—it was held that such will was a valid execution of the power in the settlement. Re Clark, L. R. 14 Ch. Div. 422, 49 L. J. Ch. N. S. 586, 43 L. T. N. S. 40, 28 Week. Rep. 758.

Where by a marriage settlement the husband covenanted that in case his wife should survive him his executors would pay to the trustees a sum certain to be held in trust for the wife for life, and after her decease as he should by will appoint; and he made his will directing his executors to raise the sum and pay it to the trustees of the settlement to pay the income to his wife for life, and bequeathed all the residue and remainder of his estate and effects to his wife,—this was a valid exercise of the appointment. Scriven v. Sandom, 2 Johns. & H. 743.

A testator by his will bequeathed a sum in $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent bank annuities to his daughter and two other trustees upon trust for her for life, and after her death to and among such of his children as should be then living, in such shares and proportions as she should by will appoint; and after his death the stock was converted into $3\frac{1}{4}$ per cents, and remained so up to the death of the donee of the power; and she afterward made her will, in which, after leaving a small legacy to a brother and sister, she left and bequeathed to another sister "all the residue of my property to be found in the $3\frac{1}{4}$ per cent reduced bank annuities (now reduced to $3\frac{1}{4}$ per cent) and all other property whatsoever and wheresoever." This was held to be a valid exercise of the power of appointment under the will of her father. Re Davids, Johns. V. C. (Eng.) 495, 29 L. J. Ch. N. S. 116, 6 Jur. N. S. 94, 1 L. T. N. S. 130, 8 Week. Rep. 39.

Where the property over which a wife was given a general power of appointment by the will of her husband consisted of a sum in consols, certain leasehold ground rents, and some shares in an insurance company; and the widow made her will dated after the operation of the wills act, and thereby gave all her real estate and such part of her personal estate as should consist of money or securities for money to the persons therein named, and gave all the rest, residue, and remainder of her personal estate to certain other persons therein named,—it was held that, upon the authorities independently of the wills act, the will was a good execution of the power; and that the shares in the insurance company did not pass under the bequest of money or securities for money; and that the leasehold ground rents did not pass under the term "real estate;" and that, therefore, the legatees of the real estate, money, and securities for money would take nothing but the consols, and the rest would go to the residuary legatees. Turner v. Turner, 21 L. J. Ch. N. S. 843.

By indenture of settlement the father of the intended husband, on the marriage of his son, conveyed a farm described in the conveyance by a particular designation, together with other lands, to the use of himself for life, with remainder to his wife for life, with remainder to the children of the son as the latter should appoint, reserving the right to the father by his will to subject and charge all or any part of the premises thereby granted with the payment of money, not exceeding in the whole a certain sum, for the portion of all or any one or more of the younger children of the father; and that he might by deed or will, for the purpose of raising such moneys, limit and appoint all or any part of the premises which would be so charged as mentioned, to any person or persons for any term of years by way of mortgage to raise the money. The father, by his will, afterward devised the farm mentioned in the settlement to his said son in fee, subject to and charged with the payment of legacies, two fifths each, to two of his daughters, and one fifth to the third one, of the whole sum thus limited, and bequeathed such legacies to his daughters respectively. The will contained no reference to the settlement, and no limitation of any term of years, and in no other way did the father exercise the power limited to him in the indenture of settlement. The vice chancellor held that the case was governed by that of Bennett v. Aburrow, 8 Ves. Jr. 609, 7 Revised Rep. 131, infra, I. d. 1, and that the legacies to the daughters were well charged by the will upon the premises comprised in the settlement. Davies v. Davies, 28 L. J. Ch. N. S. 102, 4 Jur. N. S. 1291, 7 Week. Rep. 85.

By the will of a testator a sum certain was given to his wife, to dispose of the same among her relations as she by will might think proper; and the wife, by her will, gave and bequeathed the sum to her sister and another in trust to lay out the same in their names in the public funds, upon trust, to apply and retain the dividends to the sister for life, and after her death to pay and divide the sum equally among her children; and she made her sister her residuary legatee. It was held that the sum bequeathed by the will of the husband was well bequeathed by the will of the wife to her sister and the other person upon the trusts therein mentioned. Forbes v. Ball, 3 Meriv. 437.

One having a power to appoint by will a certain leasehold estate and certain sums of 3-per cent stock standing in the name of the accountant general of the court of chancery, she being entitled to both for life, and the stock having been transferred to the accountant general, upon a bill filed by her, began her will by giving certain pecuniary legacies, and then gave "all the rest and residue of her bank stock to her god-daughter, . . . with her wearing apparel, goods, and chattels of every kind whatsoever, and all other property she possessed at the time of her decease, excepting £50 of her bank stock, which she gave thereout to her executors." She had no bank stock, or any stock whatever, except that in court, over which she had the power of appointment. It was held that the will was a good execution of the power as to the 3-per cent stock in court, and also as to the leasehold estate; it being plain that she meant to describe the property over which her power extended under the words "all other property which she possessed," by excepting out of it £50 of her bank stock, which she gave to her executors. Walker v. Mackie, 4 Russ. Ch. 76.

A testator by his will gave to trustees a sum of 3-per cent securities in trust for his daughter, with a general power to her to appoint by will. By her will she gave a variety of pecuniary legacies, and directed them to be paid out of the moneys invested in her name in 4-per cent government securities, but there were no 4-per cent government securities standing in her name, and it was conceded that she had not at the time of making her will, or at her decease, any right, title, or interest in, or any power of appointing or disposing of by will or otherwise, any bank annuities, stocks, funds, or government or other securities, except the amount of the 3 per cents standing in the names of the trustees, and that she had not at the time of making her will, or at her death, or at any other time, any property of any kind or description whatever to satisfy the bequest in her will save the amount of the 3 per cents. This was held to be a valid exercise of the power of appointment given by the will of the original testator. Mackinley v. Sloan, 8 Sim. 568, 1 Jur. 558.

Where a testator by will gave to a woman a general power of appointment of certain stock by her will, and she, by her will, appointed the stock to her two sons, and then left any other sum or property to which she then was, or might thereafter become, entitled under the will of the original testator, to be divided amongst such of her children as might be living at her death, and then constituted one of her sons her residuary legatee, and the other son died before her,—her will was an exercise of the power of appointment, and the son who was her residuary legatee was entitled to the share of the stock which she intended for the one who died in her lifetime. Re Spooner, 2 Sim. N. S. 129, 21 L. J. Ch. N. S. 151.

Where, by articles of agreement made in contemplation of an intended marriage, which was afterwards actually solemnized, it was declared that a sum certain, a portion of the wife's fortune, should be secured by the bond and warrant of her father, and the father thereafter, by his will, recited that that sum was, on the marriage of his daughter, charged for her on lands whereof he was tenant for life, with the power of appointing a larger sum for his daughters as a charge upon the estate of which he was such tenant for life; and he thereby directed that the sum which, by the marriage settlement was to be secured by his bonds, be charged upon the lands, together with other sums to be for her, his married daughter's, portion; and then directed other sums to his third, fourth, and fifth daughters, which made them each an equal amount,—such will sufficiently indicated an intention to appoint the sum first mentioned to his married daughter, notwithstanding he had not therein made any appointment to her by name. Burke v. Lambert, 15 Week. Rep. 913.

A married woman being entitled, under a settlement, to certain estates in two counties and in a city, and she and her husband having reserved a power to appoint a conveyance by a trustee as she should by any writing under her hand and seal direct and appoint, she made her last will in writing, and thereby, without taking notice of the power in the settlement, devised all her estates which descended to her by the death of her father, or grandfather, and in which she, or her husband in her right, or any other person in trust for her then had any estate in the two counties and the city first mentioned, or elsewhere in the Kingdom of Ireland. It was held that this was a due execution of the power under the settlement. Roscommon v. Fowke, 6 Bro. P. C. 158.

In order to make a general gift of moneys, securities for moneys, and other personal chattels which are in their nature subject to constant change and fluctuation, valid as a power of appointment, the will must refer to them as the subjects of the power, or they will not pass. Pepper's Will, 1 Pars. Sel. Eq. Cas. 436.

In Laugham v. Nenny, 3 Ves. Jr. 467, the master of the rolls, after holding that certain annuities, the property of a wife before her marriage, which were vested in trustees for her till the marriage, and thereafter upon trusts for the husband to receive the interest and dividends, and after his death the wife to receive them during her life, with power to the husband to dispose of the same by his last will and testament, and, in default, to the child or children of the marriage, of which there were none; where the husband settled no property of his own, and died having made no appointment of the two sums, but by his will, after general introductory words, declared his purpose to dispose of his estate and effects which he had or was interested in, but, without taking notice or affecting to make any disposition of the stock, gave some small legacies, and appointed his wife, who survived him, and another, executors; and his wife died subsequently,—were no part of the personal estate of the husband, further held that they did not pass under the power as an appointment, and the executors of the wife were entitled to recover the same against the surviving executor of the husband.

By an indenture executed previous to her marriage, a woman reserved to herself the power to appoint leaseholds and stock, and made her will executed and attested as required by the power, by which she gave and bequeathed to her husband the whole of her property, both real and personal, and whatsoever she might possess at the time of her decease. This was held not to be an execution of the power. Lovell v. Knight, 8 Sim. 275, 1 L. J. Ch. N. S. 47. The vice chancellor said that it was perfectly settled that, wherever a will is couched in such terms as that, upon the face of it, it appears to express an intention to pass the general property which may belong to the party making it, such will shall not be deemed an execution of the power in regard to any specific property.

Where one to whom the income and produce of certain stock had been devised for life, with the power to dispose of a portion thereof by any writing signed in the presence of three credible witnesses, made his will, and thereby gave several legacies, and then devised the rest and residue of his personal estate among his nearest relations, this was held not to be an execution of the power; but the amount of the stock to which the power related must go according to the will of the first testator. Molton v. Hutchinson, 1 Atk. 568.

Where a testatrix having a general power of appointment under the will of her father, by her own will, appointed an executor, who was sole trustee of the property over which she had the power of appointment, and she had not made the property, the subject of the power, her own for all purposes, the appointment of an executor not being sufficient evidence of an intention so to do, it was held that she had not appointed under the will, and the gift under the provisions of the will of her father, in default of appointment, took effect. Re Thurston, L. R. 32 Ch. Div. 508, 55 L. J. Ch. N. S. 564, 54 L. T. N. S. 833, 34 Week. Rep. 528.

Where a testator had a general power of appointment over stock in the funds which, in default of appointment, would go to his children, and the donee of the power had no other funded property, a bequest of all his personal estate, "consisting of money invested in any of the public funds, household furniture, etc.," is not a valid execution of the power. In so deciding, the master of the rolls said: "He speaks, among the different articles of personality that he enumerates, of property in the funds; and it is possible that he might have been considering this sum; but it would be too dangerous for the court to presume that when he has used language not applying to it." Webb v. Honnor, 1 Jac. & W. 352, 21 Revised Rep. 180.

A testator having, under a settlement, a testamentary power to appoint a trust fund among all or any of his children, made his will in which he gave his executors all his personal estate in trust to pay his debts and funeral expenses, then to pay one daughter a certain sum, and another the whole of his furniture and household effects, and, as to his money in funds and all his residue of personal estate, upon further trust to invest and pay the income to the last-mentioned daughter for her separate use. The vice chancellor said that the point to be ascertained in all cases like this was whether the testator points to the specific fund in existence, or is merely enumerating the different particulars of which he supposes that his property may consist at his death; and that he thought the words of this will favored the latter view; that the more reasonable construction was to hold the descriptive words as indicative of what the testator considered his personal estate might consist of at his death, and not as pointing to a specific fund in esse. He distinguished Re Davids, Johns. V. C. (Eng.) 495, 29 L. J. Ch. N. S. 116, 6 Jur. N. S. 94, 1 L. T. N. S. 130, 8 Week. Rep. 39, saying that that case turned upon very special phraseology in the will, and that the present case belonged to the other class; and he must hold that the will did not operate as an appointment. Re Mattingley, 2 Johns. & H. 496.

A disposition, by will, of all lands of which the testatrix had the power to dispose is invalid to execute a power of appointment, not as to land, but as to money to arise from the sale of lands. The master of the rolls said that the question would have been very different if she had devised the settled land by name; that it might then have been argued that by the devise of the land she meant to describe her interest in it. Adams v. Austen, 3 Russ. Ch. 461, 27 Revised Rep. 108.

A will which bequeaths the testator's personal estate, the testator having the power to dispose of, by will, the personal estate of another, in which he describes it as his own, and not as that of the author of the power, is not, prima facie, an exercise of the power. And so, where the testator had been vested with the power over lands conveyed to trustees to sell, and the money to arise on such sale and sales, the will, having no reference to the deed or the sums to arise from the sale of the estate conveyed by the deed, is not an execution of the power to dispose of the proceeds of such sales. Lowes v. Hackward, 18 Ves. Jr. 168.

d. Effect of general provision in donee's will.

1. Presence or absence of interest aside from power.

Where a statute has not intervened, it has been generally held that a general provision in the will of the donee of a power of appointment, in which neither the power nor the subject of it is alluded to, will not operate as an exercise of the power. But even at common law, if the testator (the donee of the power) had no property, estate, or interest of his own, so that the general provision in his will would be inoperative except as an exercise of the power, in such case the general provision in the will would be deemed an execution of it. In other words, where the testator had an interest, and also a power to appoint his interest was deemed sufficient to satisfy the general provision of the will, and the power remained unexecuted.

Where a wife, by the will of her husband, had the power of appointment of his estate by will, her will which bears no evidence that she supposed she had an interest in the lands which she devised by it, and does not refer to the power given by her husband's will, must be held to apply to that which was made subject to that power, through which alone, she having no interest, the will made by her could operate. Weir v. Smith, 62 Tex. 1.

Where a woman had a power of appointment, under her husband's will, of a large sum of money wholly in personality, and by her own will she disposed of a large amount in specific money bequests, besides making a residuary disposition of "all the rest, residue, and remainder of my estate;" and, wherever she made reference to her property, it was always as "my estate," with a nomination of an executor and a provision by which she gave and conferred upon him or his successor full power and authority to manage and control her said estate, and generally to do all things necessary and proper, in his judgment, in the management of the estate which might come to his hands under this her last will; and her own separate estate would not pay more than one third of her specific money bequests; but, if there were added to her private estate that which came to her from her husband coupled with the power of appointment contained in his will, all the bequests would be paid and a considerable sum would fall into the residuum,—under this state of facts, it was held that the power of appointment conferred upon her by the will of her husband was exercised by this her own will, as the making of a bequest that can only become effectual by the execution of a power certainly evinces an intention to execute it. Foster v. Grey, 96 Ill. App. 38.

Where a will devised land to one for life, coupled with a power in the devisee to will and dispose of the same in such manner as, by any instrument in the nature of a last will or testament, she might deem proper to make; and, in the event of such power not being exercised, the property was devised to two daughters of the testator; and the donee of the power executed a will in which she ordered and directed all her just debts and funeral expenses to be paid, and thereafter devised and bequeathed to the two daughters who would take in the event of her nonappointment all her property, real, personal, and mixed, and all her estate of every kind whatsoever and wheresoever situate, the will containing no reference to the power, nor any description of the subject of it,—it was held that it still was a good exercise of the appointment, as it would clearly be inoperative in so far as it purported to dispose of real estate. Balls v. Dampman, 69 Md. 380, 1 L. R. A. 545, 16 Atl. 16.

Where by the residuary clause of a will a testatrix, after providing for the payment of all expenses and legacies, bequeathed the balance of her estate to her two children, and it did not appear that she possessed, at the time she made the will, any estate that was not covered by the power, except one slave who was disposed of by a previous bequest, it was seen that on the face of the will, if it did not operate upon the property covered by the power which was then in the possession of the testatrix, it must, of necessity, fall in its most important provisions. Andrews v. Brumfield, 32 Miss. 108.

One of the exceptions to the general doctrine that a general devise or bequest, or a general residuary clause, will not in itself be a sufficient exercise of a power of appointment by a testator, is where one possessing the power to dispose of real estate by his last will, and having no other real estate except that over which he possesses the power, devises by his will generally all his real estate; such devise is deemed to have been made in execution of the power, although the power is not specially referred to, and although the particular real estate embraced in the power is not specially described in the devise. Pepper's Will, 1 Para. Sel. Eq. Cas. 436.

If a will contains a devise of all the testator's lands generally, and he has some lands upon which the will may work by his interest, the law will attribute the will to his interest, and the land which he has only the power to devise will not pass, as if the will be of all his lands in a county or place named, and he has lands of his own therein; and where a testator having a power of appointment over certain freehold and copyhold estates was seized of other freehold estates, and devised all his freehold and copyhold estates without reference to the power, this would execute the power so far as the copyhold estates were concerned, but not as to the freehold. Ibid.

Where a wife under the will of her husband took a life estate in a house and lot with a power of appointment, a direction in her will "that my executors sell my house and lot after my death" is an execution of the power, where she had no title or claim to any other real estate than that acquired by the will of her husband. Keefer v. Schwartz, 47 Pa. 503.

Where a will contains a disposition of property, and there is nothing for it to operate upon except in execution of a power of appointment possessed by the testator, the will will be a valid exercise of the power, although neither the power itself, nor the subject of it, is referred to therein. Cathey v. Cathey, 9 Humph. 470, 49 Am. Dec. 714.

A married woman by her will, made in exercise of a power, may pass such hereditaments as are subject to her power, but is incompetent to pass other property; and so such a will is held to be simply an execution of her power of appointment. DuHourmellin v. Sheldon, 19 Beav. 389, 2 Week. Rep. 639.

A general devise or bequest will not, independently of the statute (7 Wm. IV. & 1 Vict. 64 L. R. A.

chap. 26) operate as an execution of a power; but it is also settled that where a testator disposes of real estate, not having any other than what is subject to the power, he is in such case to be taken as dealing with that estate, and that as to both reality and personality, if the court is satisfied, by the manner in which the particular property is referred to, that the testator intended to deal with that property, the disposition will be a valid execution of the power. Lake v. Currie, 2 DeG. M. & G. 536, 16 Jur. 1027. The court said that the cases had gone upon very fine distinctions, but that the general rule was clear; and so it was held in this case that where the testator so disposed of all his estate, and he had an estate other than the one over which he had the power of appointment, but which was limited to himself for life with remainder to his sons in fee, he could not have supposed that he was disposing of an estate which belonged absolutely to his son, and, therefore, his general devise must be construed to have reference to that estate over which he possessed the power of appointment.

If a tenant for life of lands in a certain-named place, having the power to revoke the uses and limit new ones, devises by his will all his land in that place, naming it, having no other lands there, the lands shall pass though no mention be made of the power. Deg v. Deg, 2 P. Wms. 415.

A testator by his will directed his real estate to be sold, and the money arising from the sale and the residue of his personal estate he gave in trust for his wife for life, and after her decease, as to one moiety, for such person or persons as she should by any deed or writing, or by will, appoint, and, for want of appointment, etc., the real estate was not sold, and the testator's widow received the rents and the produce of the personal estate for her life, and by her will, after disposing of some specific articles which she described to have been her husband's, she gave all the rest, residue, and remainder of her estate and effects of what nature or kind soever, whether real or personal, which she should be possessed of, interested in, or entitled to, at the time of her decease, to a person whom she appointed as the executor of the will. She possessed no other real estate than that directed by her husband's will to be sold. This was held to be a valid exercise of the power of appointment. Standen v. Standen, 2 Ves. Jr. 589, Affirmed in Standen v. McNab, 6 Bro. P. C. 193. The lord chancellor (Loughborough) said that it was admitted that there would be no doubt, if she had said, "of which I have power to dispose," those last words would not add much after what she said before; but, that, take it according to the strict technical rule in Clere's Case, 6 Coke, 17b, a general disposition will not dispose of what the party has only a power to dispose of, unless necessary to satisfy the words of the disposition; that where she had no other real estate, and he was bound to satisfy all these words upon the technical rule, he could satisfy them in no other way, and could not avoid supposing what everyone must be convinced she meant,—that she made no difference between what she had from her husband and her other property.

Where a woman possesses, under the will of her husband, the power of appointment, and has such an interest in the estate of a brother which she is not in a situation to dispose of by will made during coverture, her will disposing of the residue of her estate will be held to be an exercise of the power. Stevens v. Bagwell, 15 Ves. Jr. 139.

Where a person having the power of appointment by will, executed a will in which she did not refer to the power, or describe the particular lands subject to it otherwise than by the words "my estate," yet, if she had no other real estate, the will, of necessity, must be understood to mean the estates included in her power, and is, therefore, a valid exercise of the same. Wallop v. Portsmouth, 2 Sugden, Powers, Appx. No. 11.

Where a testatrix not possessed of any property other than that as to which she held a power of appointment executed her will by which she gave all her property and estate whatsoever and wheresoever, and of what nature, kind, or quality soever the same might be, she thereby exercised the power. Atty. Gen. v. Wilkinson, L. R. 2 Eq. 877, 12 Jur. N. S. 593, 14 L. T. N. S. 725, 14 Week. Rep. 910.

A power of appointment under a settlement is properly exercised by a will which bequeaths legacies to the persons named therein, and then as to the residue of the property gives, subject to debts and funeral and testamentary expenses, the residue equally between two sisters, where the testatrix had never made any appointment or direction by deed or will of the funds subject to the trust of the settlement, except so far as the will operated as such appointment or direction, and she was not possessed of any property other than that comprised in the settlement. Re Wilkinson, L. R. 8 Eq. 487, Affirmed in L. R. 4 Ch. 587, 17 Week. Rep. 839.

Where, under the will of her father, a married woman had power, by deed or will, to appoint a life interest in certain funds to her husband, and by her will she bequeathed certain legacies out of her separate estate, or out of the estate and effects over which she had any disposing power, and then specified the legacies, all of which were given to persons who were not objects of the power, and then proceeded to give, bequeath, and appoint all the residue of her estate and effects whatsoever and wheresoever unto her husband absolutely; and she had no other testamentary power of appointment,—it was held that this was a valid exercise of the power; that the circumstance that this power was the only testamentary power to which she was entitled was, as had been held in many cases (citing Pidgely v. Pidgely, 1 Colly, Ch. Cas. 255, 8 Jur. 529; Banks v. Banks, 17 Beav. 352, 1 Week. Rep. 511; Re Teape, L. R. 16 Eq. 442, 43 L. J. Ch. N. S. 87, 28 L. T. N. S. 799, 21 Week. Rep. 780; Re Swinburne, L. R. 27 Ch. Div. 696, 54 L. J. Ch. N. S. 229, 33 Week. Rep. 894, supra, I. b), to afford evidence of considerable cogency of an intention to exercise such power. Re Milner [1899] 1 Ch. 563, 68 L. J. Ch. N. S. 255, 80 L. T. N. S. 151, 47 Week. Rep. 369.

Where, by a codicil to his will, one having the power of appointment over lands recited in such codicil that on the marriage of his eldest son he had executed a deed conveying his interest in such lands, and that he directed his trustees to deliver to such son the reversionary property of every kind to which he was entitled after the death of his brother, the son binding himself to pay a sum certain to his younger brother and sisters; and the testator had no other property on which the codicil could operate which would be sufficient to pay the charge to the younger brother and sisters,—such codicil was a good execution of the power. Jones v. Jones, 13 Ir. Ch. Rep. 409.

One being entitled to a fee-simple estate in certain designated real property, by a separation deed provided an annuity for his wife with remainder to such uses, etc., as he by deed or will should appoint in favor of his child or children born in his lifetime, and ultimate remainder to him in fee; and thereafter the property was mortgaged, and the owner, by his will dated the same day of the mortgage, devised and bequeathed all his real and personal estate and effects whatsoever, whereof he had the power to dispose, to the plaintiffs, upon trust that the trustee should convert, and, as soon as convenient after his death, make sale and absolutely dispose of, all his real estate so devised to them in trust for the benefit of his children; and after his death the plaintiffs, with the concurrence of the mortgagee, contracted to sell the real property designated in the separation deed to the defendant, which was the only real estate which the testator had at the date of his will. This was an action upon that contract, and one of the questions was whether the plaintiffs and the mortgagee could make a good title subject to the annuity. The court held that the appointment in the present case was a due execution of the power, and that in this case it was not necessary to rely on the statute of wills, it being stated that the testator had no other real estate than that which was the subject of the power. Cowx v. Foster, 1 Johns. & H. 30, 29 L. J. Ch. N. S. 886, 6 Jur. N. S. 1051, 2 L. T. N. S. 797.

Where, by a settlement, a single woman, who afterward married, provided therein that, in case she should leave issue that should survive her, then the trustees should, upon her direction as evidenced by her will, convey the premises to and amongst such child or children as she should leave, and in such manner and proportion as by her will should be directed and appointed; and she made her will, and, having a settled intention to advance her husband and his family, as she frequently declared, gave and devised to her infant son all her real estate in a certain county, and willed that her son should enter into full possession of one half of the same at the age of twentyone, or marriage, and into the full possession of the residue thereof at the death of his father; and gave to her husband all the rents and profits until such time as her son should accomplish his age of twenty-one or marriage, and thereafter one half of such rents and profits during his life, and, if the son should die in minority without issue, then she devised all said real estate to her husband forever; and she died on the same day, and a few months after the son died, an infant without issue,—on a bill filed by the husband against the heirs at law of the wife and the trustees to compel a conveyance of the title in fee from the proper parties to the husband, the lord chancellor dismissed the same on the ground that, if the husband had any title to the premises in question, his remedy was proper at law, and not in equity. On appeal to the Parliament, the decree of dismissal was reversed, and the chancery court was directed to state a case to be sent to the judges of King's bench for their opinion upon the point, as to whether the will or instrument purporting to be the will of the wife was a good appointment of the estates therein contained. Rich v. Beaumont, 6 Bro. P. C. 152.

A reporter's note to the above case states that it was rather singular that the House should direct a case for the opinion of the court of King's bench, instead of ordering the judges to attend, and calling for their opinion in the usual way. And that in Hearle v. Greenbank, 3 Atk. 707, 1 Ves. Sr. 305, Lord Chancellor Hardwicke said "that this was the only instance of a case made by the direction of the House of Lords, for the opinion of the judges." The reporter further states that it was still more extraordinary that, after such a case was directed, no steps should have been taken on either side to have it argued, for, after very laborious search, he was not able to discover a single trace of any further proceedings in the cause, except an order of the court of chancery directing the case to be settled by the master in case the parties differed in stating it. The syllabus states that "In 3 Atk. 707, the principle of this case was thus stated by the attorney general (arguendo in the case of Hearle v. Greenbank [3 Atk. 695, 1 Ves. Sr. 305, infra, II. f]): 'It is a rule, that where a person has two ways of doing a thing, and it cannot be done one way, it should be done another; ut res magis valeat quam pereat; so that, if it cannot be disposed of by way of interest, yet it shall be a good disposition by way of power.'"

Where a wife, by the will of her husband, had a general power of appointment over a certain sum by said will left in the hands of trustees, and by her will bequeathed legacies greatly exceeding the amount of her estate exclusive of the sum over which she had the power, and then bequeathed to her niece all her other personal estate and effects whatsoever and wheresoever over which she had any disposing power, this was a valid exercise of the power. Lowe v. Pennington, 10 L. J. Ch. N. S. 83.

The will of a married woman having a power of appointment under her marriage settlement to appoint by will amongst the children and issue of the marriage, by which she gave and bequeathed all her real and personal estate not thereinbefore otherwise disposed of, "which by virtue of any power, or authority, or of any separate right of property," she was competent to dispose of, is a valid exercise of the power; as to hold that it is not would be striking out of the will those words altogether. Re Boyd, 63 L. T. N. S. 92.

It is well settled that, if the donee of a power has no freehold estate, except that which is the subject of the power, the will of the donee giving freehold estate will be so far deemed an execution of the power; for otherwise the will, as to that property, would wholly fail. Grant v. Lynam, 4 Russ. Ch. 292, 6 L. J. Ch. 129, 28 Revised Rep. 97.

A testator by his will directed that a certain sum should be raised and received and held by trustees to invest and pay the interest and dividends to his daughter during her life, and after her decease to assign the same as she should by her will give or dispose of the same. The donee of the power, by her will, after bequeathing some pecuniary legacies, gave all the rest, residue, and remainder of her moneys unto her executors in trust, and then, subject to such certain annuities, she gave the said trust moneys, stocks, funds, and securities unto the children 64 L. R. A.

of her sister, and thereafter gave to the children of her sister all the property, mentioning it, by every conceivable name, which she was or might become entitled to under and by virtue of the provisions and directions contained in the will of her father. It was held that as she, in the first part of her will, disposed of all her personal estate, therefore, the words at the latter end could not refer to what was her own, as they would be superfluous, and the will was an execution of the power. Maples v. Brown, 2 Sim. 327.

Where a husband, by deed, for the consideration of love and affection, and for better sustenance, to live comfortably and be better cared for in her affliction, and the sum of $100 in hand paid, executed to his wife, without words of inheritance, a deed of land to dispose of at her death as she might think proper, by deed or will, to whomsoever she chose to make her heirs of her estate, a will executed by the wife, devising the land to her husband for life and then to others, is a valid execution of the power of appointment, for the reason that, although a feme covert, she was competent to execute a power, whether collateral, appurtenant, or in gross, without the concurrence of her husband, and even in his favor; but, as such, she had no right to make a devise of real property, and especially of the land conveyed to her by her husband's deed, for it only conveyed to her a life estate, and her will, therefore, would have been inoperative except as an execution of the power, and for that purpose it would be sustained in equity. Taylor v. Batman, 92 N. C. 601.

Where the will of a testatrix devised to her husband, subject to his curtesy, all her estate in trust to pay the income to her daughter during life, and convey and pay over the same to such use as the daughter should by her last will and testament appoint, the will of the daughter, giving to her father all the rest and residue of her estate, real and personal, of every name and nature, is not a valid exercise of the power of appointment. It was conceded that the donee had no real estate of her own on which the devise could operate, and it was contended that the use of the word "real" in the devise was sufficient evidence of an intention to execute the power. The court held that this was not so. Mason v. Wheeler, 19 B. I. 21, 61 Am. St. Rep. 734, 81 Atl. 426.

Where the question was raised that there had been no due execution of a power of appointment, the court said that one of three things must be true: That if, under the language of the will creating the power, the whole devise was to the devisee, he would take an estate in fee, and his own will would pass the land by virtue of his title; that, if he took an estate tail and the appointment was void, the land would descend to the eldest son as the heir at common law; and that, if he took a life estate, then he had no interest to pass under his will, and, to make it operative at all, its operation must be attributed to the power; and that in either case those contesting his right to send the property, as he did, by his will, had no foundation for their contention. Graeff v. DeTurk, 44 Pa. 527.

The will of one having a power of appointment over certain freehold and copyhold estates, who is seised and possessed in his own right of other freehold estates, which devised all his freehold and copyhold estates without reference to the power, is an execution of the power as to the copyhold estates, but not as to the

A person seized of 3 acres of land each of equal value, held in capite, made a feoffment in fee of two of them to the use of his wife for her life, for her jointure, and afterwards made a feoffment by deed of the third acre, to the use of such person or persons and of such estate or estates, as he should limit and appoint by his last will in writing; and afterwards, by his last will in writing, he devised the said third acre to one in fee; and it was held that, having conveyed two parts to the use of his wife, he could not make any devise; therefore the devise ought, of necessity, to inure to the limitation of a use, or otherwise the devise would be utterly void. Clerc's Case, 6 Coke, 17b, Cro. Eliz. pt. 1, p. 877, Cro. Jac. pt. 2, p. 31, F. Moore, 567.

Where a testator was invested with a power of appointment over one sixth of certain real property under a certain will; and in his will stated, previous to the devise, that he was, under the will of the other person, possessed of and entitled to one undivided sixth part or portion, and he had an interest and property in another one sixth part of these lands under the will of his father-in-law,—his will is not a valid exercise of his power of appointment. Lendrick v. Russel, 10 Ir. Eq. Rep. 269.

Where, by an indenture of settlement, a testator had, upon a certain event, the fee of an estate subject to a term, and by the same settlement was invested with the power in a particular event, to appoint the fee subject to the term by will; and by his will he devised the estate in fee without making any reference to his power of appointment,—the will operates upon his interest, and is not a valid exercise of his power of appointment. Farmer v. Bradford, 3 Russ. Ch. 354, 5 L. J. Ch. 157, 27 Revised Rep. 89.

Where a testatrix having a power of appointment, in favor of her children, over two different sums of two different kinds of stock which by her marriage settlement had been assigned to trustees, by her will gave and bequeathed, and, by virtue of every power enabling her in that behalf, appointed, all the property of or to which she was then, or at the time of her death, should or might be, possessed or entitled to have or dispose, to the trustees in the settlement, after payment of her debts and funeral and testamentary expenses, to invest the residue in the funds in government or real securities, and then create a trust in favor of her children; and she died possessed of personal estate more than sufficient to pay her debts and funeral and testamentary expenses,—the will was not an exercise of the power. Clogstoun v. Walcott, 13 Sim. 523, 7 Jur. 618.

The rule is that, for a general gift to operate as an execution of a power, it must refer either to the power or to the subject of it; but referring to part of a subject, or to some of many subjects, will not be sufficient to make the will operate as an execution of the power as to such parts, or such subjects, as are not referred to; and so, where a woman had, under the will of her sister, a power of appointment, and she made a bequest, and had property otherwise than that over which she had the power, to which the language of her will properly applied, such will did not operate as an execution of the power of appointment given by the will of her sister. Hughes v. Turner, 3 Myl. & K. 666, 4 L. J. Ch. N. S. 141.

A testator, by his will, devised a hotel to his executors in trust to permit his son to take the income for his own use and maintenance during his life, and after his decease to the use of such persons as he by his last will might appoint, and, in failure of such appointment, to his children or their issue then living. The person to whom this power of appointment was left died leaving a will by which, after directing the payment of his debts, he gave and bequeathed one moiety of all the rest and residue of his estate, whatever and wherever, to his wife, and the other moiety to his brother to hold in trust for his children upon the terms and conditions therein expressed. The court said that the power in this case was clearly not executed; that the hotel was not mentioned in the will of the person clothed with the power, nor was the power referred to, and the terms were satisfied by the property which he left, without including that as to which the power existed. Bilderback v. Boyce, 14 S. C. 528.

Where, by a will, the income of a fund was to be paid to the testator's widow during her life, and at her death the whole fund to go to another if he should survive the widow, and, if not, to such person as he should by his last will appoint; and the donee of the power left a will by which, after making certain bequests, he gave the residue of his estate, which was of large amount, to a legatee and his children, but made no express appointment with regard to the fund as to which he had under the first-mentioned will the power of appointment,—such will disposed only of his own private property, and was not a valid exercise of the power of appointment. Johnson v. Stanton, 80 Conn. 297.

Where a will gave to trustees a portion of the estate of the testator with directions to pay over the income to his daughter during her life, and at her decease to convey the same to her children, if any, and otherwise to such persons and in such portions as the daughter by her last will should appoint, and, in default of appointment, to her heirs at law; and the daughter thereafter died leaving a will and a large amount of property of her own, giving several legacies and making a residuary bequest, but not alluding to the trust fund, or her power of appointment, but referring to the property bequeathed as "my estate," and her own property was more than sufficient to pay her debts and meet all the requirements of the will,—her will was not a valid exercise of the power of appointment. On the question under consideration two of the five judges dissented. Holister v. Shaw, 46 Conn. 248.

Napier v. Napier, 1 Sim. 28, 5 L. J. Ch. 66, 27 Revised Rep. 144, was the case of an exception taken by a purchaser to the title of an estate sold in the cause. The testator, under whom the vendors claimed, devised to his only son, and his daughters, executors, administrators, and assigns, all and singular, his manors, messuages, lands, tenements, and hereditaments, situate, lying, and being in nine several parishes, which he particularly named in his will. In one of these parishes he had lands in fee, and also lands over which he had a power of appointment, and all the lands in that parish were included in the present sale. In five of the parishes he had only lands in fee, and in three of them he had only lands over which he had a power of appointment. His son, the first devisee, was an object of the power; but there were devisees over, in certain events, to persons who were strangers to the power. It was conceded that the lands in the five parishes, where he had only lands in fee, passed by his will. It was also conceded that the lands in the three parishes, where he had only lands subject to his power, also passed by the will, upon the principle that the will, as to the three parishes, would be otherwise wholly inoperative. It was also conceded that his lands in fee in the one parish passed by his will; and the dispute was as to whether the lands of that parish which were the subject of the power also passed, and it was held that they did not.

Where, by an antenuptial contract, money, choses in action, book accounts, and other personal property of the wife, to a certain amount, were assigned to the husband as so much money, in consideration of which he agreed to pay the wife, during life, the interest on that sum annually for her sole and separate use, with power to her to devise and bequeath the same with the interest due thereon by will the same as if she were sole, and she died leaving a will devising all her estate, real, personal, and mixed, to her daughter; and the husband had neglected to pay her the interest for four years previous to her death,—it was held that she having this interest, and therefore property aside from that, over which by the antenuptial agreement she possessed the power of appointment, and, the general provision in her will making no reference to the power or to the principal sum, the subject of the power, and there being property upon which the will could operate independent of the power, it was not a good execution of it. Mory v. Michael, 18 Md. 227.

The question under consideration arose in an action by the executor of the will of the wife against the husband to recover, under the provisions of the will, the whole of the gross sum first mentioned, and also the several annual payments of interest for which the defendant was in default. On a demurrer to the bill, which had been sustained by a pro forma decree from which the complainants appealed, and the court held, as stated, that the demurrer should not have been sustained, as the court had jurisdiction to compel the husband to pay the amount due for interest, but, as an exercise of the power of appointment, the will was invalid, as the decision in regard to the interest was the only one essential to the reversal of the decree. Standing alone, this case might not be deemed a binding authority as to the question of the exercise of the power of appointment.

But in Maryland Mut. Benev. Soc. I. O. of R. M. v. Clendinen, 44 Md. 429, 22 Am. Rep. 52, in which action, in holding that the will was not a valid exercise of the power, as no intention appeared or was expressed, and it not appearing that the testator had or had not other estate on which his will might operate, so that no inference could arise, from the want of other property, in favor of the supposed appointment,—the court said that the question was fully examined and discussed in the case of Mory v. Michael, and quoted from and approved what was said on the subject in that case, which would seem to make it an authority for the proposition laid down in it.

A will which makes no reference to the power of appointment possessed by the testator, or to the subject on which it was to operate, is not a valid exercise of the power, where the testator had other property, and the will would not be inoperative without the aid of the power. Patterson v. Wilson, 64 Md. 198, 1 Atl. 68.

Before the act of 1888, chap. 249, it had been repeatedly decided by the court of appeals of Maryland that the intention to execute a power of appointment by will must appear by a reference in the will to the power or to the subject of it or from the fact that the will would be inoperative without the aid of the power. The will of a married woman who is the donee of a power of appointment, which bequeaths to her husband all her property, of every description, absolutely, and revokes all former wills; but which makes no reference to the power, or to the subject of it,—operates with full effect on the personal property which belonged absolutely to the testatrix at the time of her death; and, as the property within the scope of the power was all personal estate, it is not necessary to look to it for the purpose of furnishing a subject-matter for the bequest, and the will is invalid as an exercise of the power. Mines v. Gambrell, 71 Md. 30, 18 Atl. 43.

Where a woman by her father's will had a life estate in the property thereby given her, with a power of disposing of it by will, or appointment in the nature thereof, among her children and grandchildren, or some of them, with a provision that, in case she should die without issue surviving, she should have power to appoint, but only as to one half; and there was no evidence of her intent to execute the power under her father's will; and she was possessed of a large quantity of real and personal property, which she owned independently of what she derived from her father's estate,—her will could not be construed as an execution of the power given her by her father's will. Meeker v. Breintnall, 38 N. J. Eq. 345.

In Birdsall v. Richards, 18 Pa. 256, the court, after stating what was decided in Ciere's Case, 6 Coke, 17 b, supra, and approving the doctrine there laid down, held that where one had created a trust whereby he reserved the order, disposal and control of the property for and during the term of his natural life, and, after his decease, to such uses as he should by his last will direct and appoint, and, in the absence of such last will, for the use of such persons as would be entitled to his personal estate in case of his intestacy, that, conceding he had a power as well as an estate, a residuary clause in his will is sufficiently comprehensive to carry the estate, and the will is an election to devise as owner, and not to appoint by virtue of the power.

Where a testator domiciled in one of the United States by his will gave the power of disposition of certain personal property situated at the domicile of the testator to another person domiciled in England, the will of the donee of the power, which refers only to his own estate, is not a valid execution of the power, although in it he says that part of his personal estate may be invested, at the time of the decease, in bonds, mortgages, and other securities in the United States of America; and it is straining the words to say that by them he meant, not his own, but the estate of the donor of the power. Bingham's Appeal, 64 Pa. 345.

Where a wife under the will of her husband took a life estate with a power of disposal, with a vested remainder to another, subject to be devised by the due execution of the power, a general devise contained in the will of the wife, she being also possessed of other real and personal property, which she held and controlled in her own right, will be held not to have been an exercise of the power under the settled rules of construction. Burleigh v. Clough, 52 N. H. 267, 13 Am. Rep. 23. In this case the court said that it had doubts as to the practical justice of the rule, but felt confident that its application to the present case would do no wrong, but that, upon all the circumstances in the case, it would fully effectuate the intention of both the husband and the wife with regard to the disposition of their several estates.

A person, being seised in fee of certain lands, made a settlement of the same by a lease and release to such uses as he should appoint by deed or will, and, in default of such appointment, to the use of himself for life, and thereafter to his children as tenants in common in tail, with cross remainders between them in tail, and remainder to the use of himself, his heirs, and assigns; and thereafter disposed of all his real estate whatsoever, all his leasehold premises, household furniture, money, and all other his real and personal estate whatsoever and where-soever upon certain trusts; and at the time of making his will and at his death was seised in fee of lands besides those subject to the power. The devise was not a good execution of the power. Davies v. Williams, 1 Ad. & El. 588, 3 Nev. & M. 821.

By a marriage settlement certain leasehold property was conveyed to trustees in trust for the husband for life with remainder to the wife for life with remainder to the children as the husband should appoint, and, in default, between them equally. Thereafter the husband had freehold property, and was possessed of a life interest in the leaseholds in question under the settlement, in addition to the whole legal interest therein which he had procured to be granted to him, and he had, besides, an absolute interest in other leasehold property. Under these circumstances, he made his will, and gave £1,000 in trust for his daughter; he then gave his freehold and leasehold estates for the benefit of a son, and, in the commencement of his will, he noticed the settlement in order to say that he confirmed it. It was held that this was not an execution of the power; that he might have referred to the power, or he might have been in such a situation as not to be able to use the word "leasehold" without raising the necessary inference that he intended to execute the power; but, from the mode in which he referred to the settlement, and as he had other property upon which the will could operate, it was not an execution of the power. Tanner v. Elworthy, 4 Beav. 487, 5 Jur. 1099.

A person entitled to personal property which he had derived indirectly through the will of his father settled his share as to a certain amount thus received from his father upon certain trusts, and as to the residue, in the event of there being any, in trust for himself. A sum certain was settled upon him for life, remainder to his wife for life, remainder among his children as he should appoint, and, in default of appointment, among his children. He made a will giving and bequeathing all the personal estate that he derived through the will of his father to his two daughters exclusive of his other children. It was held that the portion which he had reserved to himself in the settlement satisfied the language of the gift, and it was, therefore, not an execution of his power to appoint. Noel v. Noel, 4 Drew. 624, 7 Week. Rep. 572.

Where one having a power to appoint by will amongst his children certain lands, and having other lands of his own, makes his will, in which, without referring to the power, after giving legacies to his children, he devises all the rest, residue, and remainder of his lands to his eldest son, such a will is not a valid execution of the power. Doe ex dem. Hellings v. Bird, 11 East, 49.

A man surrendered a copyhold estate to two persons to the use of his wife for life, and, after his death, to pay the rents and profits to all his children equally, and then, in trust, to such use or uses as he should by deed or will appoint, and, for want of appointment, to his son and his heirs. His wife being dead, he afterwards made his will in the presence of three witnesses, in which he gave all the rest, residue, and remainder of his effects, real and personal, of what nature, kind, or quality soever, to another son. It was held that there was nothing at all descriptive of the thing which he had power to dispose of, but what was applicable to other estates of which he was seised, and of which he could equally dispose; and that the will was not a good execution of the power. Ex parte Caswall, 1 Atk. 559.

General words of gift will apply to a power, where the testator could not give the property otherwise than by virtue of the power; but words of gift do not, in general, apply to the execution of a power. And where a testator refers to a power, but has other estates to which the will can apply, such a reference in connection with the general disposition is not an execution of the power. Lowson v. Lowson, 3 Bro. Ch. 272.

In Bradley v. Westcott, 13 Ves. Jr. 445, 9 Revised Rep. 207, it was held that where the wife, being tenant for life by the will of her husband, by the same instrument was given power of appointment as to certain jewels and other articles of which she should be possessed at her death, a will executed by her of all her personal estate, and all her estate and interest therein, is not an execution of her power, as all the words she employed were applicable to her own personal property. The master of the rolls said that the only case which appeared to be any kind of authority was Standen v. Standen, 2 Ves. Jr. 589, supra, and that certainly the argument of Lord Rosslyn does go to the length that the very same words that are sufficient to dispose of a person's own property are sufficient to dispose of property over which he has an absolute power of appointment.

Whether a party meant to execute a power of appointment is always a question of intention. At one time it was required that there should be an express reference to the power, but that rule is changed, and the intention may be collected from other circumstances; as, that the will includes something the party had not otherwise than under the power of appointment; that a part of the will would be wholly inoperative unless applied to the power. In this case it was held that there was nothing of the sort, and that no description of property was disposed of that there was not something to answer other than what was included in the power of appointment; and that, therefore, the power was not exercised. Bennett v. Aburrow, 8 Ves. Jr. 609, 7 Revised Rep. 131.

The will of one in whom resides the power of appointment, under a marriage settlement of so much of an estate as shall not exceed a sum certain, which gave, devised, and bequeathed "the whole of my property, real and personal, consisting of a farm, and whatever may devolve to me by virtue of the marriage settlement," to a trustee, upon trust, after the death of his wife, for his five children in unequal shares, describing the estate mentioned; and thereafter gave to the trustee a discretionary power, either to divide the income of "my entire property" according to the provisions before made, or to sell the whole and divide the proceeds,—will not operate as an exercise of the power of appointment where there was property of his to which the words, giving full effect to them according to the terms of the will, exclusive of the settlement, would apply. Wildbore v. Gregory, L. R. 12 Eq. 482, 41 L. J. Ch. N. S. 129, 19 Week. Rep. 967.

A testator settled upon his daughter for life certain property with a power of appointment vested in her in favor of her children. She afterward executed her will by which she directed "that all my property of every kind— . . . in a word all I may be seised of at the time of my death"—should be divided among her children in certain shares, and made no reference in her will to the special power of appointment given to her by her father. It was held that her will was not a valid exercise of that special power. Re Huddleston [1894] 3 Ch. 595, 64 L. J. Ch. N. S. 157, 8 Reports, 462, 43 Week. Rep. 139. The court said: "Is there anything to show that she was exercising the power? So far as I can see, there is not a word; whereas she distinctly speaks of 'my' property, 'my' trustees, and all 'I' may be seised of. It may be somewhat technical to rely upon the words 'seised' in a lady's home-drawn will; but the word 'seisin' has such a definite technical meaning in law that one cannot help noticing it in passing. This lady was disposing of property which was her own, and not property over which she had a power, and which was not her own."

An action of debt on a bond conditioned for the payment of a sum of money to such person as the obligee should appoint cannot be maintained against the obligor by the legatee of the person having the power of appointment, under a disposition of all the rest, residue, and remainder of her ready money, personal estates, and effects whatsoever under a residuary bequest contained in her will, as such power of appointment is not executed by a mere bequest of the residue. Buckland v. Barton, 2 H. Bl. 136.

A bequest contained in a will executed before 7 Wm. IV. & 1 Vict. chap. 28, came into operation, bequeathing legacies more than the amount of property which she actually owned, will not be considered the execution or exercise of the power of appointment by her in a will, where there was no reference in her will to the instrument creating the power, and no reference therein to the property subject to the power. It was alleged that, as her own property was of inconsiderable amount, it was in a very high degree improbable that she had an intention to give anything else than that of which she could dispose under the power, the pecuniary legacies added together being identical with the amount of the fund over which she had the power of appointment; but it was held that this was not enough to raise more than a conjecture, and, therefore, not enough to form grounds of judicial determination. Davies v. Thorns, 8 64 L. R. A.

A daughter having the power of appointment, under the will of her father, to dispose of the principal sum given her for life among any child or children in such shares or proportions as she by will might direct, gave certain sums to each of her four daughters, and a large sum to her son, the latter covenanting to pay the dividends thereof to two of her daughters during their lives as long as they should remain single, and then gave all the residue of her personal estate and effects, after several pecuniary legacies, by virtue of any general power she was able to dispose of by her will, unto her said son. The question in the case was whether the residuary clause in her will was a valid exercise of the power of appointment as to the remainder of the sum that came to her by the will of her father. A vice chancellor had held that it was, but this was reversed, and it was declared that her share in the trust fund, beyond the four sums bequeathed to her daughters and the larger sum bequeathed to her son subject to his payment of annuities to his sisters, was undisposed of, and dividable among all her surviving children under the limitation in her father's will. Butler v. Gray, 39 L. J. Ch. N. S. 291, L. R. 5 Ch. 26, 18 Week. Rep. 193.

In a case submitted to the Queen's bench, in which the question was whether one was seised of an estate of inheritance in fee, or was only a tenant for life, the question arose as to whether one having the power of appointment by will, who at the same time had family estates coming from his own ancestors and on which he resided, part of which were under a settlement and part were at his absolute disposal, had by his will, in which he used the words "all my real estate over which I have any disposing power I give to my eldest son, his heirs, and assigns," had exercised the power, and it was held that he had not. Cooke v. Cunliffe, 17 Q. B. 245.

Where the will of a person invested with a power of appointment devised, bequeathed, and appointed all her real and personal estate and effects of every kind to her daughter absolutely, and appointed the daughter sole executrix, but referred neither to the power in the settlement by which the same was created, nor to the property, the subject of the power; and it did not appear that the testatrix had no general power of appointment of other property, but it was stated, and not denied, that she had none.—the vice chancellor stated that he was unable to hold that an intention to exercise the special power in the settlement appeared upon the will, and that, the question being one of intention appearing on the face of the instrument, there was no exercise of the power in this case. Re Richardson, Ir. L. R. 17 Eq. 436.

An unmarried woman invested with a limited power of appointment, after making specific bequests of particular property without any reference to the power, or the property which was the subject of it, then "bequeathed the residue of her personal estate" among certain persons, objects of the power; and she possessed, in addition to the property specifically bequeathed, a reversionary interest in some trust funds. The will was held not to be a valid exercise of the power. Humphrey v. Humphrey, 36 L. T. N. S. 91.

Where a testatrix had power to dispose of certain lands, and money to be laid out in lands, her will, whereby she devised "all and every her freehold messuages, lands, tenements, and hereditaments" is not a valid exercise of the power, where it appears that she was entitled to two freehold houses in her own right, as the latter would satisfy the terms "messuages, lands, tenements, and hereditaments." Hoste v. Blackman, 6 Madd. 191.

In Davies v. Williams, 3 Nev. & M. 821, 1 Ad. & El. 588, the court of King's bench, in answer to the question as to whether one who settled lands to certain uses, reserving to himself a power of appointment by will, and by his will devised "all his real estate, whatsoever and wheresoever, in possession, reversion, remainder, or expectancy," and then devised his leasehold and personal estate, "and all other his real and personal estate whatsoever and wheresoever," and who, at his death, was seised in fee of other lands and of the ultimate reversion in the fee of the first-mentioned estate, exercised the power of appointment,—stated that the will did not operate as an execution of the power.

A testator, by his will, gave to his daughter a general power of appointment over a certain sum. The daughter, by her will, after reciting the will of her father and the power thereby given her of appointing the sum, and her intention to exercise it, directed that nine tenths of the sum should be assigned and transferred to her mother absolutely, and that the trustees should transfer and assign five sixths of the remainder to another to stand possessed of the same upon the trusts and for the intents and purposes therein declared concerning her residuary estate; and bequeathed all the residue of her stock in the public funds, and all her moneys and property, the rest, residue, and remainder of her estate and effects, whether under the will of her father or otherwise, to the trustees upon trust to invest the same in the public funds, and to stand possessed thereof, and also of the residue of the said trust funds which should remain after paying the several legacies of stock to her mother and the other person, upon certain trusts therein declared; and she appointed two executors, one of whom was one of the trustees to whom she had directed that the trust fund should be transferred. The mother died before the testatrix, whereby the appointment in her favor failed; and it was held the sum was not well appointed by that part of the will of the testatrix which disposed of the residue of the stock or funds, and that it fell into the residue of the original testator's estate. Easum v. Appleford, 5 Myl. & C. 58, 10 Sim. 274, 10 L. J. Ch. N. S. 81.

A testatrix gave and devised her freehold and copyhold estates to the use of one, his heirs, and assigns, upon trust to permit a woman to receive the rents for her life for her own use and benefit, and, after her death, upon trust to sell and dispose of the same, and out of the produce thereof, among other things, to pay a certain sum, and the sum was thereby bequeathed to such person or persons as such tenant for life should by her last will appoint. The latter survived the testatrix, and made her will, whereby she bequeathed the sum, and likewise the whole of her household furniture, plate, and linen, etc., to one whom she appointed her executor, who proved the will, and thereafter filed a bill charging that the last testatrix, at the time of her death, was not possessed of, or entitled to, any personal estate whatever, except a few articles of household furniture, which were sold and the produce applied in payment of the funeral expenses. It was held that the will was not an execution of the power under the will of the original testatrix. Jones v. Tucker, 2 Meriv. 533. The master of the rolls said that "the question is of considerable importance." With reference to the general rule, to which it is sought to make it an exception, it is, assuming the statement to be true, perhaps as strong a case as can be brought before the court. If a person, having no property at all, and only a power over a certain sum of money, gives that single sum, little doubt can arise as to the intention. . . . Here it is alleged that the testatrix had no property, except a few articles of household furniture which she has specifically bequeathed. Some property, however, she had. She speaks of rent due to her, as well as household furniture, plate, and linen. . . . A will of personality speaks at the death. The state of that description of property at the time of the will does not furnish the same evidence as to the intention."

Where a testator by his will left a sum of money for the benefit of a married woman, to be paid to her father, if living, for her use and benefit, and with a power of appointment by her father for her separate use and provision for the benefit of her and her children, and the father made his will giving her a special legacy, and then gave to his trustees and executors all his money, and personal property to convert into money, and directed the residue after payment of debts and expenses, together with the produce and estates which he had directed to be sold, to be distributed into two equal shares, and gave one moiety in trust to his said daughter during the joint lives of herself and her husband, to her separate use, and, after the death of her husband in her life, to pay her a certain annuity for her life, and subject to such annuities as to the capital, in trust for all her children born or to be born, equally, and in case no child should attain a vested interest, in trust for another,—it was held that, as this will had no reference to the power, and from the nature of it could only be considered, not as executing the power, but as a disposal of his own fortune, the father must, therefore, be considered as having in his hands the sum mentioned which he received under the will of the original testator, and as having died without executing the power in such a manner that the court could say how he had executed it. MacLeroth v. Bacon, 5 Ves. Jr. 159, 5 Revised Rep. 11.

Where a testator by his will left to trustees a trust fund to pay the dividends to his daughter for her life for her separate use, and, after her decease, for her children, as she should by deed or will appoint; and thereafter a deed was executed between the daughter and trustees, whereby it was declared that the trustees should stand possessed of four other sums of money and the securities therefor, to pay the income to the grantor during her life for her separate use, and after her decease to her husband and children as she should appoint by deed or will; and she afterwards married, and her husband confirmed the settlement, and thereafter, upon the birth of her first child, she made her will providing that, in the event of her leaving children, her husband should enjoy the interest of her property during his lifetime and at his death to his children; and at her death leaving her husband and three children surviving her, she was entitled to a certain sum, being the proportionate part of the income of the several trust funds settled upon her as above mentioned; and she also had a reversionary interest in some trust moneys contingent on the death of her mother intestate, and her mother survived her,—her will did not operate as an execution of the power contained either in the settlement or in the will of the father. Evans v. Evans, 23 Beav. 1, 26 L. J. Ch. N. S. 193, 3 Jur. N. S. 7, 5 Week. Rep. 169.

Where a testator devised and bequeathed his estate to his executors in trust to hold the same during the life of the survivor of his children, and thereafter until his youngest grandchild living at the death of such surviving child should arrive at lawful age, and to pay certain annuities to his children; and further, that on the death of a child leaving issue the said executor should hold the share of the child so dying for the use of the issue in such proportions as the said child should appoint by will, but subject to the trusts before mentioned; and one of said children, by his will, gave his estate in equal shares to his three children absolutely,—each of said children, by virtue of both wills, acquired the absolute ownership of the share appointed to him or her, though possession of the legal estate could not be had until the termination of the trust created by the original will. Re Lafferty (Pa.) 57 Atl. 1112.

2. Circumstances surrounding donee.

But absence of interest in the donee of a power of appointment by will is not the only ground or reason which will render a general provision in the will by which it is claimed the power has been exercised effectual as an execution thereof. In the cases which directly follow, it will be seen that various circumstances surrounding the donee at the time of the execution of the will may show so conclusively an intention on his part to exercise the power as will be held to be a valid execution of it.

It is competent to permit facts to be shown and considered by which a comparison may be made with the amounts disposed of by the will of a testator having a power of appointment by will with the testator's own property, and to infer that he intended to exercise the power from the fact that the gifts in his will would not be available without resorting to the property which was the subject of the power. White v. Hicks, 33 N. Y. 383, Affirming 43 Barb. 64.

In the above case the court of appeals discussed the question whether it was proper to compare the dispositions of the will with the state of the testator's property at the time it was executed, for the purpose of deducing an intention to dispose of property which the testator did not own, but which he had a right to dispose of under a power; and stated that the terms in which the principle that the intention to exercise the power is to govern in determining in a given case whether it has been executed would admit of such a comparison, and, in many probable cases which might be put, would demonstrate, without the possibility of mistake, that such an intention existed, giving example of one possessed of a mere modicum of property, but clothed with a power to dispose of a large amount, bequeathing pecuniary legacies, sums corresponding with the amount disposable under the power. It would be perfectly evident that he relied wholly on the power of appointment to give effect to the testamentary act; and yet, if the circumstances could not be inquired into, the intention could not be shown, and the will would be inoperative. The opinion then goes on to discuss the English case of Andrews v. Emmot, 2 Bro. Ch. 297, supra, I. b, c, at considerable length, stating, as a reason for doing so, that it was the first case met with which determined that the amount of the property, at the date of the will, cannot be inquired into, and because the case is very generally referred to in the subsequent cases as the foundation of the rule. The court said that that case was correctly decided, as the question under discussion was not the prominent question there; but that in Nannock v. Horton, 7 Ves. Jr. 302, supra, I. b, the principle that the amount of property at the time of making the will could not be regarded in ascertaining whether the power was intended to be executed was carried to an extreme length. In that case Lord Eldon said: "I am not sure, the rule does not oblige the court to act against what probably might have been the intention nine times in ten;" and, speaking of Andrews v. Emmot, 2 Bro. Ch. 297, Standen v. Standen, 2 Ves. Jr. 589, and Hales v. Margerum, 3 Ves. Jr. 299, supra, I. d, i, said that they were "'clear and distinct and positive, and express, to the point, that you are not to inquire into the circumstances of the testator's property at the date of the will, to determine whether he was executing the power or not,'" and concluding "by saying that 'whatever might have been the intention, I am bound by the authorities to say, this testator did not mean to affect any property but what was his own.'" The court then proceeded further to say that "after this very emphatic judgment of the eminent chancellor, it was not to be expected that any English equity judge would depart from the rule thus laid down." The court then discussed other English cases holding the same way, in one of which the judge delivering the opinion said that he did so only because forced to by the rule only in holding that the testamentary disposition was not an exercise of a power, saying that in his private opinion he thought the intention was to so exercise it, but he felt bound by the rule; and of another, who said that he must, although almost ashamed to say it, decide, against what he firmly and sincerely believed to be the intention of the testatrix,—that the power of appointment had not been exercised, but that he was bound, however, by the authorities; that he could not help himself and must so decide. The court proceeded further to say that these cases which held that the state of the property of a testator cannot be taken into account in determining whether he intended to execute a power over personally were determined since the judgments of the English courts ceased to be authoritative precedents with us, and that they could find no distinct statement of that doctrine prior to the revolution. That Clere's Case, 6 Coke, 17b, supra, I. d, i, which is often cited in this connection, had very little, if any, bearing upon the question, as the circumstance which, in that case, prevented the devise from taking effect on a testator's interest as owner, was, that he had exhausted his disposing power as owner by the gift of two thirds of his lands to his wife. The court said that this rigid and impolitic rule had been abrogated by the statute 7 Wm. IV. & 1 Vict. chap. 26, § 27, which also contained a similar provision in regard to wills of real estate, parliament following in the last-mentioned provision the act of 1830 (1 N. Y. Rev. Stat. 737, § 126), and that the New York courts ought not to follow a rule thus condemned, and which had been abolished in the country by whose courts it was established.

Where a will is claimed to be effectual as an execution of a power, all parts of it may be considered and its language and terms construed in the light of circumstances surrounding the testator at the time of the execution of the will; and if, from all this, it can be seen that it was his intention, in the dispositions he made, to execute the power, such intention will have effect, and the power need not be referred to in express terms. All that is necessary is that it can be seen that he intended to dispose, not only of the property which he owned in his own right, but of property which he had the right to dispose of just as effectually as if he did own it, under the power of appointment. Hutton v. Benkard, 92 N. Y. 295.

In considering the question whether a power of appointment has been exercised by a devise in a will when the subject of the power is real estate, it is the well-settled doctrine that you may always look at the condition of the property and the facts dehors the will to arrive at the intention of the testator; and, where a woman held, under the will of her deceased husband, a life estate in two thirds of the south 30 feet of a lot, with power to dispose of the same as she thought fit, the fact that, after the death of her husband, she purchased the other undivided one third in fee, and the same was conveyed to her in fee, that she also purchased other real estate in fee, and that, at the time of the execution of her will and of her decease, she held the entirety of the said south 30 feet, one third in fee simple absolute, and the other two thirds for life with full power of disposition by will,—there could be no judicial presumption that at the time she made the devise she had forgotten that she owned this 30 feet, or by what tenure she held it, or that she had the power of appointment, under the will of her husband, as to the undivided two thirds. These circumstances, in connection with the fact that the undivided two thirds of this small piece of land would, in the event of it being held that she did not intend to exercise the power, be divided among 222 heirs of her husband, together with the fact that she by the same will bequeathed in general terms as her property a watch and a quantity of furniture which had belonged to her husband, to which she made some additions after his death, and over which, by his will, she also had a power of appointment,—considered together, clearly show an intention on her part to exercise the power. Funk v. Eggleston, 92 Ill. 515, 34 Am. Rep. 136.

Where a woman under her husband's will was vested with a life estate in lands, coupled with the power of fully disposing of the fee by devise or bequest if she so desired, and, by the preamble in her will, she stated that she made it "in pursuance of and more fully to carry out the provisions of the last will of my late husband," this, coupled with the fact that the person who, by the will of the husband, would have taken in default of appointment died previous to the execution of the wife's will, made it apparent that her will disposing generally of all her property was a due execution of the power. Rnilderick v. Wright, 148 Ind. 477, 47 N. E. 981.

Where a woman having, by the will of her husband, the power to dispose of one half of his residuary estate, executed her will, by which she gave to a seminary all the rest, residue, and remainder of all her estate, the question was whether she meant to exercise all her disposing power, and it was held that the inference from the will was that she did not understand it to be necessary or useful to distinguish between an estate in remainder and an unlimited power over such estate, or between property that would go to her heirs if she did not otherwise direct, or property that would go to them on her order; and that the gift to the seminary was a valid exercise of the power. Kimball v. New Hampshire Bible Soc. 65 N. H. 139, 23 Atl. 83-85. The court said that her proprietary interest, her actual and rightful possession, use, and management, and her right of appointing legatees are competent evidence of the sense in which she used the words "my estate" in the residuary clause; and that upon this, and all the competent evidence in the case, it was more probable than otherwise that she intended to exercise her entire testamentary authority, of whatever legal nature or natures it might be. And that her intention was not defeated by the rule of construction adhered to by the English courts previous to the passage of the statute 7 Wm. IV. & 1 Vict. chap. 26, § 27.

A settlement provided that the tenant for life might appoint to children, or any of them, two sums, one in consols and the other in new £ 3 per cents. He gave by will, without referring to the power, the money he had in the consols and new £ 3 per cents. The only other property he had was a sum of £144 in consols, his title to which was disputed at the date of the will, and an interest in a trust fund of a son who had died during his life. It was held that the circumstances in connection with the words of the will showed that it was not his intention to describe either of these two last-named interests, and that the will was a good appointment. Rooke v. Rooke, 2 Drew. & S. 38, 31 L. J. Ch. N. S. 636, 6 L. T. N. S. 527, 10 Week. Rep. 435.

The will of one having the power to appoint by such an instrument a certain sum, which gives and bequeathes different sums of money, amounting in all to exactly the sum of which he had the power of appointing, but which makes no allusion to that power, and contains no words which would indicate his intention to execute it, is, nevertheless, a good execution of the power; but the lord chief baron in this case at first said that he did not see how he was to get at the real point in the case, unless he was at liberty to look at what was the intention of the testator, and the state of his property at the time of declaring that intention; that he was inclined to think that the will was a good execution of the power, but did not at first decide. But, on a subsequent day, stated that he had looked into the cases, and continued in his former opinion. Lownds v. Lownds, 1 Younge & J. 445.

The following two cases would seem to differ from the foregoing:

Where a testatrix in her marriage settlement had a power of appointment by deed or will among the children of her marriage over property settled, in default of appointment, among such of the children of the marriage as, being sons, should attain the age of twenty-one, and, being daughters, should attain that age or marry; and there were only two children of the marriage,—a son who died under age before the date of the will, and a daughter; and the will gave, devised, and appointed all the real and personal estate of the testatrix whatsoever and wheresoever, and all other real and personal estate of or to which she should at her death be seised or possessed, or over which she should at her death have a power of appointment or disposition by will, unto her trustees upon trust, at their discretion, to sell and, after payment thereof of her debts and funeral and testamentary expenses, to stand possessed of the balance upon trust to invest the same during the minority and spinsterhood of her daughter for her maintenance, and to accumulate the surplus; and on the said daughter attaining the age of twenty-one or marrying, the whole for her life with remainders over,—such will is not a valid execution of the power. The court cited Von Brockdorff v. Malcolm, L. R. 30 Ch. Div. 172, 55 L. J. Ch. N. S. 121, 53 L. T. N. S. 263, 33 Week. Rep. 934, supra, I. b, and approved the statement in that case that the simple question is, whether there can be found in the will itself such an indication of intention to exercise the power that the court should hold that it has been exercised; that it is a question of intention and a question of intention only; and that there was quite sufficient in this case to distinguish it from the cases of Re Swinburne, L. R. 27 Ch. Div. 696, 54 L. J. Ch. N. S. 229, 33 Week. Rep. 394, supra, I. b, and Re Davies, L. R. 13 Eq. 163, 41 L. J. Ch. N. S. 97, 25 L. T. N. S. 785, 20 Week. Rep. 165, infra, I. d, 3. Re Cotton, L. R. 40 Ch. Div. 41, 58 L. J. Ch. N. S. 174, 37 Week. Rep. 232.

One having a life estate under the will of another, with a power of disposition, in order to execute such power must indicate the intention to do so on the face of the will by which it is claimed it is executed, because it is clear that the court cannot look beyond the will, whatever is the inadequacy of a testator's property, to satisfy the terms of the will; and, whatever may be the conviction of the court of his intention to execute the power, the state of his personality at the time of the will, or of the death, cannot be examined for the purpose of collecting evidence of his intention. Jones v. Curry, 1 Swanst. 66, Wils. h. 24.

8. Under statutes.

The reluctance with which the English and American judges enforced the old rule of the common law,—Lord Eldon saying in one case: "I am not sure, the rule does not oblige the court to act against what might have been the intention nine times in ten" (Nannock v. Horton, 7 Ves. Jr. 398, supra, I. b)—resulted in the enactment of statutes in several of the states and in Great Britain, to the effect that a general devise or bequest in the will of a testator should be construed to extend to any property which the testator might have power to appoint, and should operate as an execution of such power, unless a contrary intention should appear by the will. These statutes are, in substance, identical. The New York act, which in terms applies to lands, has been held by the courts of that state to extend the same rule to personality. Previous to the adoption of these statutes, however, the states of Massachusetts and New Hampshire had declined to follow the old rule of the common law, and held that a general devise or bequest would operate to execute a general power of appointment. (See Massachusetts and New Hampshire cases in supra, I. a.) It must be remembered, however, that the statutes and Massachusetts rule apply only to cases in which the power of appointment is general; and that, as will be seen in the cases which follow, in all instances where the power is limited or restricted in its creation the decision of the question whether or not it has been duly executed by the will of the donee thereof must be determined by the original rules.

The presumption of law under the act 7 Wm. IV. & 1 Vict. chap. 26, § 27, is that a general devise or bequest shall operate so as to pass everything over which the testator has a power of appointing, unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will; and so where, by a marriage settlement, certain leasehold property was limited upon trust to pay the rents to the wife during her life, and, after her decease as the husband should by his will appoint, and he made his will, and, after making provisions for his only child, a son, proceeded to give all his other personal property, describing it generally, and his leasehold message or tenement and premises, and all other his estate, property, and effects whatsoever which he should be possessed of or interested in or entitled unto, at his decease, subject to the payment of the legacies, and also subject, as to such parts thereof respectively as were comprised in the indenture of the marriage settlement, to his wife absolutely,—this was held to be a valid exercise of the power of appointment in the settlement. The testator died leaving his widow and his son, the only child, him surviving, and thereafter the son died leaving a widow, and administratrix, and three children, and it was claimed on behalf of the administratrix that the words "subject to the settlement and the trusts thereby declared," and that the settlement was expressly ratified and confirmed in all respects in the very clause contained in the bequest of the wife, amounted to a clear indication of intention on the part of the testator that his will should not operate as an execution of the power; but the court held that, by adopting such construction, he would be forcing the words of the will, that construction amounting, in effect, to this,—that, by subjecting the bequest in his will to the trust in the settlement the testator meant to exclude from the operation of the will the entire property comprised in the settlement; that the trusts of the settlement were for the widow for life, and, after her decease, for such person as the testator should by will appoint, and that he did appoint by his will; that in this construction of the will the bequest is as much subject to the trusts of the settlement as if no appointment had been made, and the property had been left to go as in default of appointment. Hutchins v. Osborne, 4 Kay & J. 252, 3 DeG. & J. 142, 27 L. J. Ch. N. S. 421, 4 Jur. N. S. 830, 6 Week. Rep. 246.

Whether wise or not, or well founded or not, the notion in act 7 Wm. IV. & 1 Vict. was, that it is more probable that the testator's general intention will be carried out by including in a sweeping general devise all lands over which he had any sort of testamentary power, than by excluding those over which he had only a power, just as a testator may be taken to intend to pass, by such a general devise, real property which he had almost forgotten. Walker v. Banks, 1 Jur. N. S. 606.

In Phillips v. Cayley, L. R. 43 Ch. Div. 222, the court referred to a decision by Mr. Justice

Kay in Charles v. Burke, 60 L. T. N. S. 830, a note of which is appended to the report, in which he stated that that judge avoided a difference from Mr. Justice North in Re Marsh, L. R. 38 Ch. Div. 630, 57 L. J. Ch. N. S. 639, 59 L. T. N. S. 595, 37 Week. Rep. 10, infra, II. c. by deciding the point before him on different grounds which were satisfactory to his mind; but that he certainly did very much doubt the soundness of Mr. Justice North's decision in the case last mentioned, and called attention to the fact that Mr. Justice Chitty, in Re Phillips, L. R. 41 Ch. Div. 417, 58 L. J. Ch. N. S. 448, 60 L. T. N. S. 808, 37 Week. Rep. 504, infra, I. e., while distinguishing that case from Re Marsh, said that it seemed to him that the words of the power in the two cases were so exactly alike that the distinction was one of considerable difficulty, and that, in view of the opinions of these two judges, while he would ordinarily deem it his duty to follow the decision of the judge of co-ordinate jurisdiction he had no hesitation in declining to do so here and acting upon what his own opinion was, and that opinion differed from that expressed by Mr. Justice North in Re Marsh.

Where a person has a power of appointment of a sum named, a bequest of all his personal estate and effects whatsoever and wheresoever will be an exercise of the power under the statute 7 Wm. IV. & 1 Vict. chap. 26, § 27. Bush v. Cowan, 32 Beav. 228.

Under the statute 7 Wm. IV. & 1 Vict. chap. 26, a bequest of the residue of the personal estate of the testator is a valid exercise of the power of appointment by the testator of a sum of money. Clifford v. Clifford, 9 Hare, 673.

Where, by her marriage settlement, the wife's father settled certain real estate to her use for life, and, in default of issue of the marriage, to the use of such persons as she should by will appoint; and the settlement contained a power to the trustees to sell the real estate and invest it in government securities to like uses; and, by his will which he had previously executed (and afterwards by a codicil confirmed, subject to the settlement, and shortly thereafter), devised the property subject to the settlement and all his other real estate to the use of his said daughter for life, and in default of her having any issue, to such uses as she should by will appoint; and, her father and husband having both died, there having been no issue of the marriage, the trustees at her request sold all the settled real estate and transferred the proceeds, government stock, to her.—It was held that her will, made shortly after the transfer of the stock to her which bequeathed all the residue of her personal estate and effects whatsoever to two persons absolutely, her personal estate outside of the government stock mentioned not amounting to enough to pay the pecuniary legacies, must be construed with regard to § 27 of the wills act and 1 Vict. chap. 26, and read as an appointment of all the government and other funds and personal property which she had; and that it operated as an execution of the powers of appointment over the real estate given to her by her marriage settlement and her father's will, and passed the stock. Chandler v. Pocock, L. R. 15 Ch. Div. 498, 49 L. J. Ch. N. S. 442, 43 L. T. N. S. 112, 28 Week. Rep. 806.

A testatrix having, by the will of her father, power by her will to appoint any sum or sums of money not exceeding altogether a certain amount, who, by her will, devised and bequeathed all her estates, real and personal, which she might die possessed of or entitled to unto her daughter, whom, and her husband, she appointed executors of her will, thereby exercised the power of appointment; and, by force of the 27th section of the act 7 Wm. IV. & 1 Vict. chap. 26, the general devise and bequest in her will operated as such exercise to the extent of the amount limited in the power of appointment contained in her father's will. Re Jones, L. R. 34 Ch. Div. 65, 56 L. J. Ch. N. S. 58, 55 L. T. N. S. 597, 35 Week. Rep. 74.

Under the statute 7 Wm. IV. & 1 Vict. chap. 26, § 27, which enacts that a general devise shall include all property over which the testator had a general power of appointment, a will purporting to exercise a general power executed before a deed-poll, which assumes to exercise it in a different manner, has the effect of being a valid exercise of the power by virtue of § 24, which provides that every will shall, as to the property comprised in it, speak and take effect as if it had been executed immediately before the testator's death. Alrey v. Bower, L. R. 12 App. Cas. 263, 56 L. J. Ch. N. S. 742, 56 L. T. N. S. 409, 35 Week. Rep. 657.

Under the statute 7 Wm. IV. & 1 Vict. chap. 26, a will of one having the power to appoint a share of the estate given under the will creating the power, which directs the payment of the testator's debts, and then gives pecuniary legacies, and declares that if, after the payment of the debts and funeral and testamentary expenses, there is not sufficient remaining to pay and satisfy all the legacies in full, the latter shall abate ratably, operates as an execution of the power, and there is a good appointment to the executor. Wilday v. Barnett, L. R. 6 Eq. 193, 16 Week. Rep. 961.

Where a woman having a life interest in the whole, and a general power of appointment over a moiety, of the residuary estate of her late husband, made her will by which she directed that her debts and funeral expenses should be paid and discharged, and gave the rest, residue, and remainder of her moneys in the funds, and all moneys due her on mortgage or otherwise, and all her personal estate wheresoever and whatsoever of which she should die possessed, or have any title to or interest in, to her two sisters and two brothers equally, and one brother and one sister died in the lifetime of the testatrix, this was held to be an appointment which, under the old law, as well as the new, would make the appointed funds assets for debts to the extent of any deficiency of the appointor's personal estate. The vice chancellor, in deciding the case, said: "It must also, I think, be considered settled law that where a testator, with a general power of appointment, gives legacies and appoints an executor, he must be taken as exercising his general power to the extent to which the fund subject to it is required to make the legacies effective; and even that, where a testator having such a power makes a will directing the payment of his debts without more, and appointing an executor, the appointed fund is liable for the payment of his debts if his own estate is insufficient. The same rule would, I conceive, apply in both these cases, though no executor were appointed. It has not yet been decided that an appointment of an executor without more would, since the wills act (1 Vict. chap. 26), make the fund assets; and so to hold would appear to give a very unnatural construction to § 27 of the wills act as to the execution of powers by a general disposition. Having regard to the 27th section, it seems not unreasonable to hold that a testator having a general power, and directing a certain application of his property, must be taken in all cases to exercise the power to the extent to which the direction is effectual. The difficulty lies in extending this rule to cases where the direction is ineffectual." Re Davies, L. R. 18 Eq. 163, 41 L. J. Ch. N. S. 97, 25 L. T. N. S. 785, 20 Week. Rep. 165. This case has, since the decision was made, not infrequently been cited as an authority on the subject of whether there had been a valid execution of the power or not, but an examination of it indicates that the only question in the case was whether the next of kin of the testatrix, or those of her husband, the donor of the power, took the portion bequeathed to the brother or sister who died before the testatrix, and whose legacies therefore lapsed. And it is not easy to see why the foregoing quoted language of the vice chancellor can be claimed to be authority, as there did not seem to be any question but what the appointment was a valid one; but the real question in the case was as to the effect of it.

By a marriage settlement certain property was assigned to trustees upon trust for the husband for life, with remainder to the wife for her life, and after the death of the survivor upon trust for the issue of the marriage, and in the event of there being no issue of the marriage, and if the husband should survive his wife, then, after the decease of the husband so surviving and such failure of issue, upon such trust and subject to such powers as the wife by her last will and testament should from time to time, notwithstanding her coverture, direct or appoint, with a provision that, in default of appointment, it should go to the persons entitled under the statutes of distribution. There was no issue of the marriage, and the wife died leaving her husband surviving, after having made a will by which she bequeathed a certain sum to a person therein mentioned, and appointed her brother executor of her will. At the date of her will, and at her death, the property subject to the trust of the settlement amounted to about the sum named in her will, and she had no other property in her own right which she had any power to dispose of by will, save, only, these funds. It was held that her will was a good execution of the power; that the fact that the words of the will imported a mere pecuniary bequest, and contained no disposition of the residue, was of no consequence, and the testatrix knew of what her property consisted when it was settled it was a share of money, and she made a will giving a sum of money to a person; that she obviously considered that the bequest would be paid out of the property of which she had the power of disposing; and that the distinction between property and power did not exist in the present case as it did in Evans v. Evans, 23 Beav. 1, 26 L. J. Ch. N. S. 103, 3 Jur. N. S. 7, 5 Week. Rep. 169, supra, I. d. 1. Shelford v. Acland, 23 Beav. 10, 26 L. J. Ch. N. S. 144, 3 Jur. N. S. 8, 5 Week. Rep. 170. The master of the rolls then proceeded further to say that the statute 7 Wm. IV. & 1 Vict. chap. 26, had clearly no application to Evans v. Evans, which was not the case, as this was, of a general power of appointment to which alone the statute refers; and that in this case he did not think it necessary to have recourse to that statute to support the validity of this bequest as an execution of the power.

er; and that this case was governed by the decision in Curtels v. Kenrick, 3 Mee. & W. 461, 7 L. J. Exch. N. S. 169, infra, II. a. 1.

Where a testatrix invested with the power of appointment had no personal estate of her own sufficient to pay legacies which were bequests of personal property in her will, such bequests were an exercise of the power of appointment of personal estate under the 27th section of the act, 7 Wm. IV. & 1 Vict. chap. 26. Hawthorn v. Shedden, 3 Smale & G. 293, 25 L. J. Ch. N. S. 833, 2 Jur. N. S. 749.

Where the donee of a power of appointment by will, by her will, gave one half of her property which she might be possessed of or entitled to at the time of her decease, this was held to be a good appointment under 7 Wm. IV. & 1 Vict., providing that a will which gives the personal estate of a testator is that of which he is possessed or to which he is entitled. Frankcombe v. Hayward, 9 Jur. 344.

A power of appointment by will to any persons without limitation is a general power of appointment within the meaning of the wills act, and a general devise or bequest will be a valid exercise of it. Re Powell, 39 L. J. Ch. N. S. 188, 18 Week. Rep. 228.

Where there is a power given by deed to dispose of property by executing an appointment, the law always requires evidence of an intention to execute the power, in order to make any alleged appointment under the power effectual as a valid appointment; but the wills act has, in the 27th section, altered the law in this respect, and has said that, where there is a general power of appointment, a general disposition of property by will shall be held to be an execution of that power and to pass the property, unless a contrary intention appears by the will. That enactment supplies an intention, and construes a will as an appointment, unless the will itself declares a contrary intention. Moss v. Harter, 2 Smale & G. 458, 18 Jur. 973, 2 Week. Rep. 540.

The provision of the 27th section of chapter 26, 7 Wm. IV. & 1 Vict., which, in effect, enacts that a general power of appointment by will may be exercised by a general devise, was not intended to overlook or alter the distinction between property and power; but, on the other hand, it was intended to recognise that a general power of appointment, though in technical character certainly different from property, is, in substance and practice, so nearly resembling it that injustice might easily be done by preserving technical rules and insisting on their application. The act says, in effect, that one who has a general power of appointment—that is, a power to dispose of property in any way he thinks fit—is really the owner in fee simple of the property the subject of the power, and, that being so, it is only right and fair that he should be at liberty to devise the property, and to exercise over it the right of ownership, instead of exercising the power of appointment. Re Byron [1891] 3 Ch. 474, 60 L. J. Ch. N. S. 807, 65 L. T. N. S. 218, 40 Week. Rep. 11.

Ky. Gen. Stat. 1888, chap. 113, § 22, provides: "A devise or bequest shall extend to any real or personal estate over which the testator has a discretionary power of appointment, and to which it would apply if the estate was his own property, and shall operate as an execution of such power, unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will." By virtue of the provisions of this section, where property had been devised to one for life and after his death to such uses as he might appoint by will, a devise by the donee of the power of "what little property I have after the payment of my debts" is a valid exercise of the power of appointment. Payne v. Johnson, 95 Ky. 175, 24 S. W. 238, 609.

In Bolton v. DePeyster, 25 Barb. 539, Mitchell, P. J., in alluding to the provision of the New York Revised Statute (1 Rev. Stat. 737, chap. 126), said that by that statute "lands embraced in a power to devise shall pass by a will purporting to convey all the real property of the testator, unless the intent that the will shall not operate as an execution of the power shall appear, expressly or by implication;" and that this clause was introduced to put an end to the uncertainties previously existing whether a power was intended in each particular case to be exercised or not; that it laid down a clear rule which he was of opinion the courts must apply also to personal estate.

In Hutton v. Benkard, 92 N. Y. 295, the court quoted and approved Bolton v. DePeyster, 25 Barb. 539, and what was said by Mitchell, P. J., in that case, and further said that clearly, in the nature of things, there was no reason why a gift or bequest of personal property, with a power of disposition, should not be measured by the same rule as a grant or devise of real estate with the same power; and that, hence, it was of opinion that the rule laid down in § 126 of 1 N. Y. Rev. Stat., 737, in reference to the execution by will of a power as to real estate, should also be applied to personal estate.

In Lockwood v. Mildeberger, 159 N. Y. 181, 53 N. E. 803, the power was created by the will of a testatrix by which she bequeathed one sixth of her residuary estate to her executors in trust to apply the income to the use, maintenance, and education of a granddaughter, and upon her death the one sixth was bequeathed to the living issue of the granddaughter then surviving, and in default of such issue to the then surviving issue of the testatrix, etc., but providing that, if such granddaughter should die without leaving lawful issue, she was empowered to dispose of one half of the said sixth power to any surviving husband by a last will and testament. The granddaughter was fifteen years of age at the time of the death of the testatrix, and nearly sixteen years later, married, and on that date executed a will by which, after making certain general and specific bequests, she devised to her husband certain real estate, and then gave the residue and remainder of her estate, real and personal, to any child or children that might be born to her in equal shares, and then provided that, if she died without issue, then all said rest, residue, and remainder of her estate should go to her husband. It was held that by the former § 126 of the New York statute of powers, now § 156 of the real property law (Laws 1896, chap. 547), the common-law rule, that whether a particular disposition should be treated as the execution of a power was a question of intention, and that the several provisions of a will should be carefully considered for the purpose of ascertaining whether the party really meant to execute the power or not, had been changed by this legislative enactment, by which it was provided that lands embraced in a power to devise shall pass by a will purporting to convey all the real property of the testator, unless the intent that the will shall not operate as an execution of the power shall appear, expressly or by necessary implication; and that the will was a valid exercise of the power of appointment. In doing so, the court followed Hutton v. Benkard, 92 N. Y. 295, that the rule laid down in the section mentioned touching the execution by will of a power as to real estate should be applied to personal estate also.

And in Hogle v. Hogle, 49 Hun. 313, 2 N. Y. Supp. 172, the court adopted the rule laid down in Bolton v. DePeyster, 25 Barb. 539, and followed in White v. Hickes, 33 N. Y. 383, affirming 43 Barb. 64, supra, I. d. 2, that the provision of the Revised Statute, that a general devise will be a good exercise of a power to dispose of real estate by will, unless a contrary intention was expressed or be ascertained by a necessary implication, should apply also to personal estate. In this case a woman who had the power to appoint a portion of an estate, who specifically bequeathed certain personal property, which was all that she had, and then made a general devise and bequest, was held to have intended to execute the power.

In Thomas v. Snyder, 43 Hun. 14, it was held that the general language of a will is an adequate execution of a power conferred upon the testatrix to dispose of property by will.

Where a testatrix, who, by the will of another, had a life estate in certain property, with the power of disposing of the same by will, executed her will, in which she gave, devised, and bequeathed her property, and directed to what persons and in what shares her estate should be given, this was a valid exercise of the power. Kibler v. Miller, 57 Hun. 14, 10 N. Y. Supp. 375.

A testator, by his will, gave and bequeathed to his wife for life all his estate, both real and personal, and authorized and empowered her to lease, sell, give, and devise the whole or any part thereof, as, also, to convey title to real estate, as might seem proper to her. His property at the time of the making of the will, and at the time of his death, consisted of money and securities and the house and lot where he and his wife resided. By her will the wife gave, devised, and bequeathed her property in equal shares to her brothers and sisters. It was held that the word "devise," in the will of the husband, gave the power to dispose of all his property to the wife by will, and that her will was an execution of that power; that, although the word "devise" is commonly applied to the gift of real estate, it is not always; and that it is frequently used in the same sense as bequeathed, and, among unprofessional persons, applies to all kinds of property,—real, personal, and mixed. Kibler v. Huver, 10 N. Y. Supp. 375.

A testator, previous to making his will, executed a deed of trust, whereby he transferred to the trustee certain real and personal property to receive rents and income during his life, and after his death to convey and assign it to such person or persons, and in such shares, as should be designated and appointed by his last will and testament. Thereafter he made his will, in which, after giving a single legacy, he gave and bequeathed to an uncle all the rest, residue, and remainder of his estate, both real and personal property, of what nature and kind soever and wherever situate, which he might own or be in any manner entitled to at the time of his death, and this was held to be a good execution of the power of appointment contained in the prior trust deed. New York Life Ins. & T. Co. v. Livingston, 133 N. Y. 125, 30 N. E. 724, Affirming 39 N. Y. S. R. 159, 14 N. Y. Supp. 902.

Where, by his will, a testator directed his trustees to invest a sum and apply the income thereof to the use of his sister during her life, and, upon her decease, to the use of another for life, unless she should by her last will and testament have made a different disposition of the sum which she was thereby empowered to do; and she died after the testator, leaving a will by which she gave all her property to the person who, by the will of the original testator, was to have the remainder for life absolutely,—this was held to be a valid exercise of the power, although no other testamentary disposition of her property, or of any part thereof, was made by her, and the will did not contain any reference whatsoever to the power of appointment. Bigelow v. Tilden, 18 Misc. 689, 43 N. Y. Supp. 858.

By a clause in the will of a testator a trust fund was created for the benefit of a son during his life, and after his death to his children, and, on default of children, to such person or persons and in such manner or form as he should by his last will and testament limit or direct. It was not apparent that the trust fund was any different from other individual property of the donee. He had no children, and left all his property to his wife after a few legacies to others. The court said: "The subject of a reference to the power in the disposition of property is thoroughly discussed in White v. Hicks, 33 N. Y. 383, supra, I. d. 2, where the conclusion is reached that a general bequest includes a personal estate which the testator had the power to appoint by will, and that the will will be held to execute such power where there is no contrary intention apparent from the will." Re Watson, 34 N. Y. S. R. 906, 12 N. Y. Supp. 115. The language shows clearly that this was under the New York statute.

The true rule as to whether a power of appointment has been duly exercised is, that a gift of all one's real or personal estate will not include real or personal estate settled on testator for life, with remainder as he should by deed or will appoint, and, in default of appointment, for his children; there must be a reference, either to the power intended to be executed, or to the property which is the object of the exercise. Vaux's Estate, 11 Phila. 57. The court said that, if there were statutes in Pennsylvania similar to 7 Wm. IV. & 1 Vict. chap. 26, § 27, the will in this case would be held a valid execution of the power, and, as practically the same statute was enacted in 1879, such a will would undoubtedly now be held to exercise the power.

The effect of the act of June 4, 1879, of the Laws of Pennsylvania is such that where one invested with the power of appointment devises and bequeaths his estate, he devises as well that estate covered by the power; and in this case, where he gave this joint estate according to the intestate law, he gave it to those persons who, according to that law, would have taken his estate. Howell's Estate, 185 Pa. 350, 39 Atl. 966.

While the will of the donee of a power of appointment which purports only to pass the estate of the donee would, previous to the statute 64 L. R. A.

of Pennsylvania of June 4, 1879, have been insufficient as an exercise of the power, that statute, which provides that "a bequest of the personal estate of the testator, or any bequest of personal property described in a general manner, shall be construed to include any personal estate, or any personal estate to which such description shall extend, as the case may be, which he may have power to appoint in any manner he may think proper, and shall operate as an execution of such power, unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will."—makes such a will a valid execution of the power, and this notwithstanding the statute was passed after the date of the will, if the testatrix died after it went into effect. The argument that, inasmuch as the statute was not in existence when the will was executed, the testatrix could not have had it in contemplation when she made the will, ignores the purpose of the act, which was to make a general will execute the power in all cases when a contrary intent does not appear upon the face of the will. Aubert's Appeal, 109 Pa. 447, 1 Atl. 336.

The common-law rule that, where a will which it is claimed executes a power of appointment neither refers to the power nor to the property embraced in it, and there is nothing to show an intention on the part of the testator to execute it, it does not exercise the power, has, to a certain extent, been altered by the statute in Virginia (Code, § 2526) which enacts that "a devise or bequest shall extend to any real or personal estate (as the case may be) which the testator has power to appoint, as he may think proper, and to which it would apply if the estate were his own property; and shall operate as an execution of such power, unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will." And where a testatrix was empowered to appoint the property as she chose (i. e. to whom she chose), the residuary clause in her will operates, by force of that statute, as an execution of the power, a contrary intention not appearing by the will. Machir v. Funk, 90 Va. 284, 18 S. E. 197.

A power to dispose of property by will is not exercised where the donee, by his will, in no manner refers to it, and the will contains provisions inconsistent with the authority and purpose for which the power was created, and the provisions of the will naturally apply to the individual property of the donee without regard to the property and estate which is the subject of the power, all being consistent with the apparent object of the creator of the power, because there will be a necessary implication of an intent on the part of the testator and donee of the power not to exercise it. Stewart v. Keating, 15 Misc. 44, 36 N. Y. Supp. 913.

This is under 1 N. Y. Rev. Stat. 737, § 126, that a general disposition will be an exercise of a power, unless an intention not to do so is expressed, or appears by necessary implication.

Where, by a settlement, one declared that the trustees therein named should stand possessed of certain railroad stock upon trust for such person or persons, and for such purposes, as he should at any time by will or codicil expressly referring to this power appoint, and, by his will, gave and bequeathed his personal estate and effects to his three trustees and executors upon trust for conversion, and for payment of his funeral and testamentary expenses, debts, and legacies, and thereafter made four codicils to his will which did not alter the general bequest of personal estate, except by varying the trustees or executors; and neither the will nor the codicils contained any reference to the power in the settlement,—such a will was held by Kekewich, J., and by the court of appeal, not to operate under § 27 of the wills act (7 Wm. IV. & 1 Vict. chap. 26) as an execution of the power. Phillips v. Cayley, L. R. 43 Ch. Div. 222, 59 L. J. Ch. N. S. 177, 62 L. T. N. S. 86, 38 Week. Rep. 241.

Where a wife was invested with a power of appointment if she should die during the life of her husband, and was also possessed in her own right of a separate estate, and made a will during the life of her husband and with his assent, and she survived him, her will was good as a devise of her separate estate, but was invalid as an execution of the power. Noble v. Willock, L. R. 8 Ch. 778.

This was under 7 Wm. IV. & 1 Vict. chap. 26, §§ 8, 24.

Property comprised in a limited or special power of appointment exercised by will is not within § 27 of the wills act (7 Wm. IV. & 1 Vict.), which refers exclusively to general powers of appointment, and does not apply to limited or special powers. Doyle v. Coyle [1895] Ir. Rep. 1 Ch. Div. 205.

Where a codicil to a will gave to the daughter the power of appointment of profits of certain property which by the will had been given to her to dispose of by will into the surviving family of the testatrix, as she might think proper; and the donee of the power executed a will which did not contain any allusion to the will or codicils of the donor of the power, and did not purport to be made in exercise of the power,—the will of the donee was not a valid exercise of the power, and it was not assisted by the 27th section of the wills act, inasmuch as that relates only to general powers, while this could not be treated as a general power, as the appointees, the objects of the power, must be members of the surviving family of the donor. Elgood v. Cole, 21 L. T. N. S. 80, 17 Week. Rep. 953.

In Hurlstone v. Ashton, 11 Jur. N. S. 725, the question was whether a person having a power of appointment over a sum of consolidated bank annuities, who, by her will, directed the disposition of one seventh of that amount in Indian bonds, had exercised the power; and it was held that she had not. The vice chancellor said that § 27 of the wills act was clear in its interpretation that what the words of the section meant was, whereas, before the intention of a testator was frustrated by using words which imported "property" and not "power," it should not be so any longer; and that the same rule should prevail as to real and personal estate; and that a general gift of either included all; but that he was surprised, however, to find the decision of Hawthorn v. Shedden, 3 Smale & G. 293, 25 L. J. Ch. N. S. 833, 2 Jur. N. S. 749, supra, and also to find it approved by Sugden in his book on Powers, 8th ed. p. 310; and that he would have great difficulty in deciding this case if it had been on all fours with that one; but that there the gifts were all pecuniary, while here there was a gift of Indian stock, and the case was, therefore, not so strong, although there was an appointment of executors. He further stated that in the case of Shelford v. Acland, 23 Beav. 10, 3 Jur. N. S. 8, 26 L. J. Ch. N. S. 144, 5 Week. Rep. 170, 64 L. R. A.

supra, a doubt was expressed whether the words of the statute go to the full extent which the vice chancellor, in Hawthorn v. Shedden, seemed to think they did.

Where one having the power of appointment of real estate, and also of a sum of money, to all or any, or one or more, of the children or more remote issue of his marriage, before the birth of any child executed his will bequeathing all his property in trust, if he should leave one child, that such child should take all his landed and personal property; but, in the event of his leaving a son and daughter, he bequeathed and devised all such property to his son, except the amount of which he had the power of appointment, which he bequeathed to his daughter; and he thereafter died leaving two sons and two daughters,—it was held that the will did not operate as an execution of the power as to the real estate, as the provision in regard thereto was either void for uncertainty or conditional on events which had not happened, i. e., having one son and one daughter. It was held, further, that it was not an execution of the power over the sum of money, under the statute of 7 Wm. IV. & 1 Vict., as that statute was only applicable to general powers, and not to special powers in favor of particular objects. Russell v. Russell, 12 Ir. Ch. Rep. 377.

A power to appoint amongst children is not within the 27th section of the statute 7 Wm. IV. & 1 Vict. chap. 26; and a mere general devise or bequest will not operate as an execution of such power. Cronin v. Roche, 8 Ir. Ch. Rep. 103.

Where, by a voluntary settlement, a testatrix had reserved a power of appointment by will, and by her will she devised and bequeathed all her real and personal property to pay debts, funeral expenses, and certain legacies, and the residue to a residuary legatee, the general bequest did not operate as an exercise of the power under § 27 of the wills act. The court said that the words in that section, "power to appoint in any manner he may think proper," were not merely a power of appointment unrestricted in its objects, but they meant that "the power must be an unlimited power to appoint,—that is to say, unlimited in its manner of exercise. It must be a power to appoint by any instrument, whether deed or will. It would be absurd to say that a power to appoint by deed, and not by will, was a power to appoint in any manner." Re Tarrant, 58 L. J. Ch. N. S. 780.

While the statute of 7 Wm. IV. & 1 Vict. chap. 26, § 27, will operate upon property over which there is a general power of appointment, a revocation in general terms, which contains no reference to the will, does not operate to revoke a will made in execution of the general power. Re Merritt, 1 Swabey & T. 112.

A settlement which confers upon a married woman a power of appointment to any person or persons (not being her present husband or any friend or relative of his) does not create a general power, and a general devise and bequest of the property to which the power has reference, contained in a will, although made by the testatrix and donee of the power, after the death of her husband, possessing other real estate, will not pass the same under the provisions of § 27 of chap. 26, 7 Wm. IV. & 1 Vict. Re Byron [1891] 3 Ch. 474, 60 L. J. Ch. N. S. 807, 65 L.

T. N. S. 218, 40 Week. Rep. 11. It was argued for those who claimed that the will was a valid exercise of the power, that the words "friend and relative" should be stricken out as too vague, and that, if this were done, the word "husband" would alone remain, but he was dead when the power came to be exercised, so that his exclusion was inoperative, the power being in fact a general one at the time the donee proceeded to exercise it; and the court held that there was no reason why a general power, originally limited by exception, might not become a general power free from exception by subsequent events, and that, if the words of limitation had been confined to the words "her husband," the argument would have been sound; but stated that it could not adopt the argument that the words, "or any friend or relative of his," were so vague that they should be rejected.

e. Will executed before creation of power.

At common law a will devising real estate took effect at the date of its execution, while a will of personality—a will being ambulatory in its nature—was held to speak as of the time of the death of the testator. And so, as to real estate, the will devised that, only, which belonged to the testator at the time of its execution; but, as to the personality, it was a disposition of the property belonging to him at the time of his death. And, by analogy, a will executed before the creation of a power of appointment would not operate to execute the same as to real estate, but would do so as to personal property.

But now by statutes in both the United States and England a will is made to speak and take effect as if it had been executed immediately before the death of the testator with reference to the real and personal estate disposed of by it, unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will. Since which a will, whether of real or personal estate, made previous to the creation of a power of appointment, will, if unrevoked, be a valid execution of the power, unless a different intention appears by the will or by circumstances surrounding the testator. The effect of the common-law rule, and also of the statute, will be seen in the cases in this subdivision. The effect of the statutes is to some extent considered in supra, I. d, 3.

A woman, in contemplation of marrying the widower of her deceased sister, executed a settlement which provided, among other things, that if she should survive her intended husband (which happened), then from and after his death and a failure of children the property should be in trust for her but if she should die in his lifetime, then from and after his death and such failure of children, in trust for such 34 L. R. A.

person as she by her last will should appoint, and, in default of such appointment, in trust for such person or persons as would be entitled to her personal estate under the statute. The trust never arose, the marriage being unlawful. By her will, after providing for a portion of the trust moneys mentioned in the settlement, she gave and bequeathed one moiety of the residue to such persons as her husband should by deed or will direct or appoint. The husband made a will by which he gave all his real and personal estate to his wife, with the exception of a small bequest, and died leaving her surviving. It was held that his will did not operate as an execution of the power contained in her will, as no power created by the latter had any existence until her death had given validity to the instrument itself, as no one could execute a power of which he was intended to be the donee named in the will of a person who survived him, either under the old law, or under the 27th section of the wills act (7 Wm. IV. & 1 Vict. chap. 26). Jones v. Southall, 32 Beav. 31, 32 L. J. Ch. N. S. 130, 1 New Reports, 152, 9 Jur. N. S. 93, 8 L. T. N. S. 103, 11 Week. Rep. 247.

In Re Phillips, L. R. 41 Ch. Div. 417, 58 L. J. Ch. N. S. 448, 60 L. T. N. S. 808, 37 Week. Rep. 504, Chitty, J., in deciding that a power given by a voluntary settlement in which the settlor directed his trustees to invest and deal with the trust premises in all respects as he should from time to time order and direct by any writing (but not by his last will and testament or any codicil thereto, unless he should expressly refer to the said trust fund and premises), where he had, by a will made previous to the indenture or declaration of trust, appointed certain persons executors and trustees, and, after certain pecuniary and specific bequests and certain devises of real estate, bequeathed all his leasehold and personal estate and effects, whatsoever and wheresoever, to his executors and trustees upon certain trusts thereby declared concerning the same, and, after making the first voluntary settlement, he, by a further deed indorsed on the former one, settled additional funds upon similar trusts to those declared by the original deed, and thereafter made three codicils to his will, none of which, however, affected the residuary bequest contained in the will, or referred to the deed of settlement,—was not exercised by said will and codicils, said: "Perhaps I ought to have said that the case is, in my opinion, entirely distinguishable from the case of Re Marsh, L. R. 38 Ch. Div. 630, 57 L. J. Ch. N. S. 639, 59 L. T. N. S. 595, 37 Week. Rep. 10 (infra, II. c); but, if it is not distinguishable, I should have felt myself in a little difficulty in holding that I was bound by that decision."

Where, by the will of a testator, he empowered each of his children, by his or her will, or codicil thereto, to appoint to or in favor of his or her wife or husband the whole or any part of the yearly income of his or her share in his, the testator's, residuary estate for the life of such wife or husband, or any lesser interest; and directed that a sum of money thereby directed to be raised should be held upon the same or the like trusts, and with and subject to the same or the like powers and provisions,—the will of one of the sons of the testator dated previous to the date of the will of the latter, which gave all the residue of the property over which, at the time of his (the son's) death, he should have a disposing power, to trustees upon trust for sale and conversion, and directing them to pay the yearly income arising from his trust estate to his wife, for life or widowhood, will not operate as a valid appointment under the power conferred upon him by the will of his father. Re Hayes [1900] 2 Ch. 332, 69 L. J. Ch. N. S. 691, 83 L. T. N. S. 152, 49 Week. Rep. 21.

By a settlement lands were conveyed by a woman and her husband. A power of appointment generally was reserved to the wife to appoint by will the proceeds of lands to be sold by the trustees of the settlement, and, in default, to her executors, etc. Thereafter she made her will, wherein, after reciting that by the first settlement the premises thereafter mentioned and devised were settled and conveyed to her with power to appoint, she, "in pursuance of such deed enabling her in that behalf," devised and appointed certain specified property to her eldest son, and certain other real estate to her second son, and certain other real estate to another son; and subsequently, by another settlement, she, in "pursuance of the power vested in her" by the first settlement, appointed that the same trustees should stand possessed of the sums of money to be produced by such sale for such persons and purposes as she should by will appoint. The court said that his impression was that the will was revoked by the subsequent settlement, but that, if not revoked, it did not in his opinion, execute the power in the subsequent settlement, because it expressly referred to the power contained in the first settlement, and was, therefore, inoperative to pass any part of the property. Thompson v. Simpson, 50 L. J. Ch. N. S. 461, 44 L. T. N. S. 710.

In Holmes v. Coghill, 7 Ves. Jr. 499, 6 Revised Rep. 166, Affirmed in 12 Ves. Jr. 206, 8 Revised Rep. 323, it was decided that where a power exists in a person, to be executed by will, and which he exercises by his will; but the power is afterwards discharged and a new power created,—a codicil to the will, that has the effect of republishing it and making it speak as at the time of the republication, is not a valid execution of the new power.

And in Hope v. Hope, 5 Giff. 13, 18 Jur. 823, 2 Week. Rep. 674, it was held that where a person had power, under the will of his father, to appoint certain property among all or any of his children as he might see fit, such power is not exercised by his will, which contains no express reference to it, and which was made previous to the creation of the power, and in which there was no mention at all of the property which was the subject of the power, notwithstanding that he made two codicils to his said will, neither of which contained words purporting to execute any power of appointment.

So in Murray's Estate, 5 W. N. C. 296, a will made in August, 1874, was held not to be a valid execution of the power conferred upon the testatrix by the will of her father, dated nearly a year later.

And where a testator, by his will, devised and bequeathed all the residue of his property, real, personal, and mixed, of which he might be possessed at the time of his death, or over which he might at the time of his death have the power of testamentary disposition; and thereafter, by a trust deed, conveyed most of the property devised in his will, with other property, to trustees with certain trusts, among them to himself for life, and after his decease for such uses and purposes as he by his last will and testament should direct and appoint concerning the same, and he never revoked the will, the power of appointment reserved by the deed of trust was not executed by the former will. Matteson v. Goddard, 17 R. I. 299, 21 Atl. 914.

And in Re Ruding, L. R. 14 Eq. 266, 41 L. J. Ch. N. S. 665, 20 Week. Rep. 936, it was held that, while the intention of the person possessing the power of appointment is a thing to be considered in deciding the question as to whether an appointment has been made by will, where a person who had previously made a will containing a general residuary bequest which ordinarily, under the wills act (7 Wm. IV. & 1 Vict. chap. 26, § 27), would operate as an exercise of the power, after the making of the will makes a settlement of certain personalty between himself and two trustees therein named, reserving to himself a power of appointment by will, and the circumstances attending the making of the settlement are such as indicate no intention on his part to change it, the will which antedates such settlement will not be considered an appointment thereunder.

But afterwards in Boyes v. Cook, L. R. 14 Ch. Div. 53, 49 L. J. Ch. N. S. 350, 42 L. T. N. S. 556, 28 Week. Rep. 754, where a testator made his will, whereby he gave all his real estate and the residue of his personal estate to his wife and two others in trust, to sell and stand possessed of the proceeds upon trust to invest the same and pay the annual income to his wife during her life or widowhood, and, after her decease or second marriage, in trust for his children in the manner therein stated; and thereafter, differences having arisen between him and his wife, a separation deed was executed, whereby he conveyed all his real and personal property to trustees upon trust to sell and convert the same into money, to pay one third of the income to himself for his life, and, after his death, to stand possessed of the same in trust for such person as he should by his last will appoint, and, in default of the appointment, upon the same trusts as were thereafter directed respecting the remaining two thirds, which were for the benefit of the children; and he died without having revoked or altered his will; and the question arose whether the residuary gift in the will operated as an execution of the general appointment reserved in the subsequent separation deed, and it was held that it did—James Lord Justice, delivering the opinion of the court of appeal, said that it was difficult to distinguish Re Ruding, L. R. 14 Eq. 266, 41 L. J. Ch. N. S. 665, 20 Week. Rep. 936 from the present case, and that, if necessary, that case must be overruled.

Under the combined operation of the 24th and 27th sections of the act 7 Wm. IV. & 1 Vict. chap. 26, a will, though made before the power was created, is a good execution of it. Stillman v. Weedon, 16 Sim. 26, 18 L. J. Ch. N. S. 46, 12 Jur. 992.

This, of course, because by § 24 of that act the will is made to speak as of the instant before the death of the testator.

By a deed of settlement lands were conveyed to a trustee to the use of the intended wife and her heirs until the marriage should be solemnized; and from and after the solemnisation thereof to the use of such person or persons and upon such trusts as the wife, whether covert or sole, and without consent, should by any deed or writing, or by her last will, or any codicil thereto, limit, direct, or appoint. The wife, several months previous to the execution of the settlement, had executed a will, and, after the execution of the settlement, but before the marriage, she executed a codicil to the will, whereby she devised lands in trust for the children of the marriage, and, in default or failure of children, in trust for her husband for life. This was held to be a good execution of the power, notwithstanding the fact that the marriage between herself and her husband had not yet taken place, and was, therefore, contingent. Logan v. Bell, 1 C. B. 872.

Where a testator had made his will disposing of all his property, and thereafter settled a sum upon trust for his wife for life, with remainder to himself for life, reserving to himself power to appoint the same by will, a specific bequest in the will which was made previously to the execution of the deed creating the power of appointment nevertheless operated as a due execution of the power. Patch v. Shore, 2 Drew. & S. 589, 1 New Reports, 157, 32 L. J. Ch. N. S. 185, 9 Jur. N. S. 63, 7 L. T. N. S. 554, 11 Week. Rep. 142.

The will of a married woman, made the day after her marriage, in which she stated that, "In pursuance and exercise of the power of appointment vested in me by the settlement executed previously to my marriage, and of every other power enabling me, I hereby appoint, give, and bequeath all the property settled by me on my marriage and over which I have any disposing power unto my dear husband," is not confined to the property comprised in her marriage settlement, but operates to exercise a power given her by the will of another who died after the execution of her will, and by his will bequeathed to her certain East Indian securities in trust for life, with remainders over. Re Old, 54 L. T. N. S. 677.

Where a testator made his will and codicils thereto, and specifically devised and bequeathed several legacies, and devised and bequeathed his estate, part freehold and part copyhold, and gave all other real and personal estate of which he should die possessed or of which he should have power to dispose, upon certain trusts; and thereafter, by a voluntary settlement, conveyed his freehold estate to trustees upon trust to himself for life and after his death upon trust for another, and after the death of the survivor upon such trusts, etc., as he by his last will, or any codicil or codicils thereto, should appoint, and, after making such settlement, he executed another testamentary instrument,—it was held that, by the terms of the last will and testament and codicils thereto, and from the fact that he afterwards executed another testamentary instrument, he must have intended by the latter to have exercised the power of appointment. Pettinger v. Ambler, L. R. 1 Eq. 510, 35 L. J. Ch. N. S. 389, 14 L. T. N. S. 118, 33 Beav. 321. The master of the rolls said, however, that it must be understood that, if the testator had not made a will after the settlement, he should have held that the first will was an execution of the power.

In Thomas v. Jones, 2 Johns. & H. 475, 31 L. J. Ch. N. S. 732, 8 Jur. N. S. 1124, 7 L. T. N. S. 154, 10 Week. Rep. 853, the vice chancellor, speaking of the wills act, said: "The 24th section enacts that every will shall be construed, with reference to the real and personal estate comprised therein, to speak and take effect as if it had been executed immediately before the death of the testator, unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will; and by the 27th section (for the two are connected together) it is enacted that a general devise of real estate shall be construed to include any real estate which the testator may have power to appoint in any manner he may think proper, and shall operate as an execution of such power, unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will. The 24th section draws down the will to the date of the death of the testator, thus getting over the difficulty as to after-acquired property. . . . It seems to me to be the true construction of the statute, coupling the 24th and 27th sections together, that a will may operate as an execution of all powers in the testator immediately before his death. If that construction, which was come to in Stillman v. Weedon [16 Sim. 26, 18 L. J. Ch. N. S. 46, 12 Jur. 992, supra], be sound (and Lord St. Leonards does not dissent from it), a person aut juris, must be held to intend his will to operate on powers which he had not at the date of executing it, but which he acquired before his death."

An unmarried woman by her will gave all the residue and remainder of her estate and effects, describing them, generally, to trustees for the benefit of one who afterwards became her husband. Four years thereafter a settlement was executed in consideration of an intended marriage between her and the residuary legatee in her will, whereby certain shares mentioned in the will and certain sums of money then at interest were settled upon trusts for her benefit for life with remainder to her intended husband for life, and, after the decease of the survivor, in trust for all and every "the person or persons, child or children," as she should by will appoint, and, in default, to her next of kin. The marriage took place, but afterwards proved bigamous as far as the husband was concerned, and was, consequently, invalid. It was held that, under the 24th section of the act (7 Wm. IV. & 1 Vict.), the will, although executed some years before the settlement, must be taken as speaking from the death of the testatrix, and that, as the gift was a general gift, the general bequest was, under § 27 of the same act, a good execution of the power. Coffield v. Poilard, 3 Jur. N. S. 1203, 5 Week. Rep. 774.

Where a testator disposed of his real estate by will, and, four years thereafter, real estate was settled to such uses as he by his will should appoint, and he made a subsequent will which did not pass real estate, the first will was a good execution of the power contained in the subsequent settlement under the provision of the wills act (7 Wm. IV. & 1 Vict. chap. 26, §§ 24, 27). Hodsdon v. Dancer, 16 Week. Rep. 1101.

A person conveyed to a trust company, as trustee, his one-third share in real property and existing leases of portions of it, and also personal property, in trust to pay the net income to him during his life, and provided that the death of the trustor should terminate the trust, and the trust estate, with the accretions, should vest absolutely in the persons appointed by this last will and testament of the trustor or, if he failed to make such appointment, in his heirs at law per stirpes, and the trustee should convey and deliver the trust estate as directed. Thirteen days before executing this trust deed he made his will disposing of the same property. It was held that the will was a valid exercise of the power of appointment referred to in the subsequent trust deed. United States Trust Co. v. Chauncey, 32 Misc. 858, 66 N. Y. Supp. 563.

Where a trust is created to manage the property for the use and benefit of the grantor during his life, and, upon his death, to convey to such person or persons as he may by his last will and testament designate and direct, his will executed before the creation of the trust, but which is to go into effect after the date of the instrument creating the trust, although executed before, fully satisfies the language referring to persons whom the speaker may by his last will and testament designate; as a will, whenever executed, is, in its effect, future as to any act done by the testator in his life. Howard v. Carusi, Mac-Arth. & M. 260.

Where by a will the estate of the testator was bequeathed to a trustee for the use of another during his life, and at his decease to such person or persons as he, in writing, might appoint, and the will of the donee of the power was made before the will creating the power was probated, there being nothing to show that the donee when he made his will knew of the power, and there was no reference to the subject of the power, or to the power itself, in his will, and the intention to execute it did not in any way appear,—such will does not operate as an exercise of the power. Harvard College v. Balch, 171 Ill. 275, 49 N. E. 543.

A woman made her will, by which she devised to her daughter by a former husband certain real estate for life, with remainder to the daughter's issue, and, in default of such issue, to her collateral heirs, and afterwards executed a codicil, which, among other things, confirmed the same. Thereafter, by indenture by way of marriage settlement, in contemplation of her marriage with the executor of her will, she conveyed to the trustee to dispose of during the joint lives of the daughter and her intended husband as she herself might appoint by will or codicil, and that until such new direction or appointment the will above mentioned should be taken as an appointment by will as if made under the settlement. It was held that, by virtue of the marriage settlement agreement, and the conveyance and transfer to the trustee therein contained, the will and the codicil thereto became, in legal effect, incorporated therein, or annexed thereto, so that they became and were a valid declaration of the trust upon which the property was to be held by the trustee, and an effectual appointment of the property, both real and personal, in case the testatrix should die in the lifetime of her intended husband without making any other appointment or disposition thereof; that the consummation of the said intended marriage, being the very event in contemplation of which the said marriage settlement was entered into, did not in any manner alter the effect of the last will and codicil in this respect; that they remained, according to the intent of the said marriage settlement, valid and effectual as such appointment of the property conveyed and assigned to the trustee. McMahon v. Allen, 4 E. D. Smith, 519.

Where by the provisions of a will a married woman was clothed with power of appointment by will or deed, and, in the exercise of such power, she executed her will, and therein declared her appointment, and afterward conveyed the property to another, taking back a mortgage for a portion of the purchase money, and thereafter took from her grantee's heirs a reconveyance of the property to a trustee for her own use and benefit with the same power of appointment and disposition as was contained in the original will, and died leaving her will previously made unrevoked,—the will was a valid exercise of the power, and the land passed under it as though such conveyance had never been made. Burkett v. Whittemore, 36 S. C. 428, 15 S. E. 616.

A testatrix by her will disposed of various estates, including one which she, after the making of her will, by an indenture of settlement, made by virtue of an agreement with the beneficiary of the settlement, granted to trustees, reserving to herself a power of revocation and new appointment by her will to the amount of a certain sum, and thereafter executed a codicil to her will disposing of one half of said sum, being the amount of a legacy in her will which had lapsed and confirmed her will. It was held that this was a good exercise of the power to charge to the amount mentioned in the settlement. Meredyth v. Meredyth, Jr. Rep. 5 Eq. 565.

Where a married woman had, by her marriage settlement, a general power of appointment over two sums, and by her will she gave and appointed both sums, and all other her moneys and securities, whatsoever, over which she had any power or disposition under or by virtue of the settlement, or otherwise howsoever, to two trustees, and thereafter, after certain specific bequests, bequeathed all other her goods and chattels and separate personal estate and effects, whatsoever, not thereinbefore disposed of, and over which she had any power of disposition, unto two as tenants in common; and after her death her mother died leaving a will dated nearly two years before the death of her daughter, the donee of the power, by which she gave her a legacy and a share of her residue for her separate use,—it was held that the legacy to the donee of the power from her mother passed by virtue of her will, and was a valid exercise of her power of appointment, and that it passed under the residuary clause, and not under the words "moneys and securities." Re Mason, 11 Jur. N. S. 835, 6 New Reports, 193, 13 Week. Rep. 799.

Where, by a marriage settlement, the survivor of the intended husband and wife was clothed with the power of appointment and thereafter another settlement was made and indorsed on the antenuptial settlement, between the husband and his wife of one part and the trustees of the first settlement of the other, by which personal estate was settled, by reference to the former settlement, on trusts similar to those declared therein, including the power of appointment; and thereafter the wife died, and the husband after her death made a codicil to his will by which he confirmed the same,—while the making of the will was not an exercise of the power in the settlement which had then all been made, inasmuch as the power in that settlement was only a power in the survivor alone, and, when he executed the will, they were both alive, and it followed that it could not be an exercise of the power in the settlement that had not then been made, yet, as the codicil had the effect of repeating the will, and making it as good and effectual as if it had been executed for the first time after the death of the wife, it was clear that the powers were well executed. Re Blackburn, L. R. 43 Ch. Div. 75, 59 L. J. Ch. N. S. 208, 38 Week. Rep. 104.

A woman, being then a widow, made her will, and thereafter made a codicil thereto, disposing of her property, and afterwards entered into a marriage settlement and therein assigned a large part of her property (all personal) to trustees in trust for herself for life, and after her death to be distributed to certain persons named in the instrument of settlement in the manner therein directed reserving the power of disposition by her last will and testament, or a writing in the nature thereof. She made no will other than the will and codicil which she had made previous to the antenuptial settlement, and never canceled either. The court, after holding that her subsequent marriage did not revoke the will, held that the property assigned to the trustees was not subject to it, but must be distributed according to the directions of the marriage settlement, as in case of her intestacy; that, while the provisions in the deed of settlement to take effect at her death were liable by the terms of the instrument to be defeated by her will, she evidently intended that, if so defeated, it should not be by one made previously to the settlement, but subsequently, and that the former will could not be deemed an execution of the power. Webb v. Jones, 36 N. J. Eq. 168. The syllabus to this case is misleading, as it states that the will was a good execution of the power, the reverse being decided.

A power of appointment contained in the will of a husband, providing that his wife shall have and hold his property during her natural life, and shall dispose of it as she sees fit, is not executed by the will of the wife, made five years before the death of the husband. Lepley v. Smith, 13 Ohio C. C. 189.

A will made many years before a deed cannot be interpreted as an execution of a power of appointment contained in that deed. Fry's Estate, 11 Phila. 305.

A will is not a valid execution of a power contained in a trust deed executed six years subsequently to the will. Dunn's Appeal, 85 Pa. 94.

1. What law governs in ascertaining intent.

As will be seen by reference to the cases in infra, II. a, the question whether the testamentary instrument by which the donee of a power of appointment assumes to exercise the same is a valid will duly executed, is to be decided by the law of the domicile of the donee of the power. But whether the will of the donee of a power of appointment, valid by the law of his domicile as to its formal execution, by its terms exercises the power, must, it would seem, be decided by the law of the domicile of the donor or creator thereof.

And so where, by the will of a testator residing in Pennsylvania, he created a power of disposition of personal property in that state to a person domiciled in England the question whether the donee of the power had executed the same by his will as authorized by the will of the donor, is one which must be decided by the law of the domicile of the donor and the situs of the property where they concur. Bingham's Appeal, 64 Pa. 345.

The law of the domicile of the donor of the power given by will, must govern as against the law of the domicile of the donee, in determining whether or not the will of the latter is an execution of the power. Cotting v. DeSartiges, 17 R. 1. 689, 16 L. R. A. 367, 24 Atl. 530.

And so, the establishment by express statute, both in England where the will was made and in the state where the testator was domiciled, of the rule that a general devise is sufficient to execute a power of appointment, cannot prevail in respect to a trust fund held under the will of the donor, whose domicile was in another state, as against the contrary rule, which, in the absence of a statute, prevails in the latter state. Ibid.

A married woman having a general power of appointment of property by the will of her father, she being domiciled in a state other than that of her father, and the property being situated in the state of the father's domicile, executed a will which was admitted to probate in the state of her domicile and proved as a foreign will in the state of the domicile of her father and where the property was situated, and which was valid as an exercise of the power of appointment by the law of the state where the property existed, but would not have been sufficient to constitute an effectual appointment by the law of the state of her domicile. It was held that her will was a good execution of the power. The court declined to consider whether, if it had been sufficient by the law of her domicile and insufficient by the law of the state where the property existed, it would have been an equally good execution. Sewall v. Wilmer, 132 Mass. 131.

In each of the foregoing cases the subject of the power was personal property. And in each case the statement was made that the situs of the property was identical with the domicile of the donor of the power; but whether that was an essential, or an incident, does not appear, although considerable stress seems to have been laid upon that circumstance.

II. Validity of attempt to exercise power.

a. Validity of donee's will.

1. General rule.

The necessity of a proper formal execution of a will by which a power of appointment is claimed to have been executed, and the varied circumstances under which it will appear whether a will was or was not thus duly executed, appear in the cases which follow.

Where a power of appointment was created to be executed by will, a writing importing a will, but void as such, cannot operate as an appointment. Atty. Gen. v. Barnes, 2 Vern. 597, Prec. in Ch. 270, Gilb. Eq. Rep. 5.

The will of a testatrix which has no witness is not the valid exercise of a power given to a wife to dispose of personal property after her life estate by a will "duly executed and attested." Sanders v. Franks, 2 Madd. 147, 17 Revised Rep. 202.

In order to introduce a will in evidence which authorizes a married woman, by a power in her marriage settlement, to show a title to personal property, it must have been proved in the ecclesiastical court. Stone v. Forsyth, 2 Dougl. K. B. 707.

Where a married woman is by a deed of trust invested with a power to give the trust property therein conveyed to her husband, or their children, by will, in order to found a title to any portion of the trust property thereon a duly executed will by the donee of the power must be shown. Thrasher v. Ballard, 33 W. Va. 285, 25 Am. St. Rep. 894, 10 S. E. 411.

A writing in the form of a letter, sealed on the outside only, purporting to be made in execution of a power, and concluding, "as witness my hand and seal," with a signature purporting to be that of the donee of the power, and two other names in other handwritings, but with no mention of attestation, with no evidence thereof but such as is afforded by the document, is not shown to be a due execution of the power. Burnham v. Bennett, 1 DeG. & S. 513.

At the death of a person having a power of appointment, two sheets, apparently the third and fourth sheets of a will which were in the handwriting of and signed by the person possessing the power and duly attested, which had been refused probate will not be deemed a valid execution of the power to appoint by writing purporting to be a will. Gullan v. Grove, 28 Beav. 64.

Where, by a marriage settlement, power of appointment of property was reserved to the intended wife, to be executed by will after her marriage, and she executed her will, and the marriage thereafter took place, this will was not a due execution of the power, as it became void by her marriage subsequent to its execution. Hodsdon v. Lloyd, 2 Bro. Ch. 534.

Where, by an indenture, it was provided that certain leasehold property was to be assigned to such person or persons, and in such manner and form, as the settlor, at any time or times during the term of his natural life, by any deed or deeds, writing or writings, under his hand and seal, to be attested by two or more credible witnesses, should direct, limit, or appoint of or concerning the same; and he thereafter made his will, not under seal, but executed by him and attested in conformity with the requisitions of the statute 7 Wm. IV. & 1 Vict. chap. 26, whereby he exercised the power of appointment contained in the indenture,—this was held not to be a valid execution of the power, as, in order to be such, it must comply with all the conditions of the indenture, one of which was that it should be under seal, and this notwithstanding the statute before mentioned, which provides that, in the execution of wills, one given form shall be observed, and that such form shall be an equivalent for every arbitrary form of execution which the donor of a power may prescribe, as it was not at the expense, but in favor, and for the benefit, of such donors, and in order that their intentions might not be disappointed by the neglect of useless forms that this legislative provision was made, that in this settlement the power was not to appoint by will at all, but by deed or writing, with certain required formalities. The vice chancellor said, further, that he must add that, while he could not hold that this power had been duly executed, he must at the same time add that he feared, nine cases out of ten, the intention, both of the donor and of the party executing the power, who, of course, intends to execute it effectually, would be defeated by such a decision. West v. Ray, Kay, 385, 2 Eq. Rep. 431, 23 L. J. Ch. N. S. 447, 2 Week. Rep. 319.

Where, by a marriage settlement, the woman had the general power of appointment of a sum by deed or will executed in the presence of three witnesses, and, having appointed one half the sum to her husband during coverture and after her death to her son, by deed, thereafter made a voluntary disposition of the remaining half by will, but did not execute it in the presence of three witnesses,—the will was not an appointment, as it was not for a valuable consideration, but only a voluntary disposition, and, not having been executed in the presence of three witnesses, it did not pursue the power and was void as an appointment. Sergeson v. Sealey, 2 Atk. 412, 9 Mod. 370.

Where a power to appoint personal property is required to be exercised by a will signed and published in the presence of and attested by two witnesses, if the donee, although acknowledging to the two witnesses her signature to an instrument, did not sign it in their presence, and the witnesses at different times signed the attestation to the effect that the testatrix had signed and delivered the will in their presence, the power was not well exercised. Simeon v. Simeon, 4 Sim. 555.

A marriage settlement provided that the wife might, by her last will and testament duly executed, raise a certain sum only for the purpose of paying the debts of the husband and wife, or making a provision for the children of the marriage, except an eldest son. The wife executed it by a will signed in the presence of only two witnesses. Lord Hardwicke at first held that since the statute of frauds no wills relating to lands could properly be said to be duly executed unless in the presence of three witnesses; and that to determine otherwise would be a dangerous innovation; that, though the will prescribed by the author of the power is a creature of his own, and the execution of it in the presence of two witnesses might have been good if he had thought to have ordered it so, yet, as he had expressly directed that it should be executed duly, he must be understood to have referred to some known rule, which, as he had himself mentioned none, could be construed to be no other than the rule of common law; and that the statute of frauds had furnished us with. Wilkes v. Holmes, 9 Mod. 485.

Where the power is given to appoint the uses of land by deed or will, and is attempted to be exercised by will, the will intended in the creation of the power is such a one as is proper for the disposition of land; and so, where a power is created to be executed in the nature of a will, it is meant that such instrument must be executed the same as a will, and must therefore be subscribed by the witnesses in the presence of the testator. Longford v. Eyre, 1 P. Wms. 742.

And so where lands were conveyed to trustees to convey under a power of appointment which was to be exercised as the person to whom the power was given should direct, and he assumed to exercise it by a will which was attested by but two witnesses, and was therefore void, such an instrument will not operate as an exercise of the power. Wagstaff v. Wagstaff, 2 P. Wms. 258.

Where a married woman possesses the power to dispose of personal property by will "to be signed and published by her in the presence of, and to be attested by, two or more credible witnesses," a writing purporting to be her will, and to be signed, but which fails to state that it was published by her in the presence of two witnesses, is not a valid execution of the power. Allen v. Bradshaw, 1 Curt. Eccl. Rep. 110.

But in Burdett v. Spilsbury, 10 Clark & F. 340. Reversing the court of exchequer chamber and affirming that of the King's bench, 9 Ad. & El. 396, 1 Perry & D. 670, it was held that, where lands were limited to such uses as a woman should appoint by her last will and testament in writing to be, by her, signed, sealed, and published in the presence of, and attested by, three or more credible witnesses, an instrument executed by the person possessing the power and assuming to exercise it, in which it is declared that it is the last will and testament of the person so executing it, and is witnessed by three persons, is a due exercise of the power by will, notwithstanding it does not contain a history of the solemnity of the attestation.

Where, by virtue of a settlement, a married lady possessed the power of appointment of the uses of a freehold estate, and she devised an estate comprised in the settlement, after her husband's death, to certain persons, and signed and sealed the will in the presence of two witnesses, but the attestation did not mention the word "published," it was held that this was a valid execution of the power, as a will cannot be made without being published. Vincent v. Sodor, 4 De G. & S. 294, 20 L. J. Ch. N. S. 433, 15 Jur. 365, 5 Exch. 683.

In this case the prerogative court had refused probate to the will because it was, upon the face of it, not executed according to the terms of the power, and the privy council reversed the sentence of the probate court on the ground that the ecclesiastical court had only jurisdiction to grant probate, and that it must be left to a court of equity to determine the due execution of the power. Barnes v. Vincent, 5 Moore P. C. C. 201.

Where a power was given to a testatrix to dispose of a freehold estate by any writing under her hand and seal, attested by two or more witnesses, or by her last will and testament in writing, to be, by her, signed, sealed, and executed in the presence of, and attested by, three or more witnesses, the will of the donee, in which she professed to exercise the power, which was signed by her, but was attested by two witnesses only, is not a valid exercise of the power. Bainbridge v. Smith, 8 Sim. 86, 5 L. J. Ch. N. S. 300.

Where by the terms of a marriage settlement the wife has the power, by her last will in writing, or other writing under her hand and seal, to be attested by two or more credible witnesses, to appoint the transfer of certain stock, a paper in her handwriting, not signed or sealed, nor attested by witnesses, is not a good execution of the power. Ross v. Ewer, 3 Atk. 156.

In Collard v. Sampson, 4 De G. M. & G. 244, 17 Beav. 543, 1 Eq. Rep. 262, 22 L. J. Ch. N. S. 729, 17 Jur. 641, it was held that a purchaser under a contract of sale of real estate would not be compelled to perform where the title came through the exercise, by an unsealed will, of a power to appoint "by deed or deeds, writing or writings, under hand and seal."

A power to appoint by any instrument in writing, signed, sealed, and delivered in the presence of two witnesses, is not duly exercised by a will executed in all respects according to the provisions of 7 Wm. IV. & 1 Vict. chap. 26, but which is not under seal. Taylor v. Meads, 4 DeG. J. & S. 597, 11 Jur. N. S. 166, 5 New Reports, 348, 34 L. J. Ch. N. S. 203, 12 L. T. N. S. 6, 13 Week. Rep. 394.

Where, by the instrument by which a power was created, it was required that the power of disposing of the property by the donee should be by a writing under her hand and seal in the presence of two witnesses, in the nature of a last will and testament, a will claiming to execute the power in writing, and executed in the presence of two witnesses, but without seal, is 44 L. R. A.

no defective in one of the requisites of the power purporting to be executed by it that it would generally be deemed incurably defective as an execution of the power. Pepper's Will, 1 Pars. Sel. Eq. Cas. 436.

In Dormer v. Thurland, 2 P. Wms. 506, it was held that, where a settlement provided that one might exercise the power of appointment by his last will, the chancellor held that a will which was not sealed was yet good as an exercise of the power; but, being in doubt, referred it to the King's bench, and that court held that the will was valid.

'All that the statute (24 & 25 Vict. chap. 114) does is to make a will executed abroad, by a British subject, a good will if it be such a document as is recognized to be a will by the law of that place; but it does not at all touch or interfere with the negative provision in the wills act (7 Wm. IV. & 1 Vict. chap. 26), that no testamentary appointment can be made unless it is attested by two witnesses; and so, an unattested codicil cannot be treated as being a good and valid appointment, either at law or in equity. Re Kirwan, L. R. 25 Ch. Div. 373, 52 L. J. Ch. N. S. 952, 49 L. T. N. S. 292, 32 Week. Rep. 581.

Section 10 of the wills act (7 Wm. IV. & 1 Vict. chap. 26) applies as well to powers created since, as to those created before, the statute, and by it the legislature intended to say that appointments are often required to be made by will in a mode different from that prescribed by the law as to wills in general, and the courts held it to be necessary that the power should be strictly pursued, and this caused difficulty, and a frequent failure of execution; and they then provided what was deemed a sufficient protection to the execution of wills, and said that any power to appoint by will shall be deemed duly executed if the donee complies with the statutory formalities, no matter what additional security or solemnity the donor may have annexed to its exercise. Hubbard v. Lees, L. R. 1 Exch. 255, 4 Hurlst. & C. 418, 35 L. J. Exch. N. S. 169, 12 Jur. N. S. 435, 14 L. T. N. S. 367, 14 Week. Rep. 694.

In Monday's Goods, 1 Curt. Eccl. Rep. 590, it appeared that a married woman having a power of appointment under a marriage settlement, by her will bequeathed the whole of her separate property to her husband, with the exception of a small legacy, and afterwards survived him. Upon her decease, and upon affidavits stating that she died without any known relation, the King's advocate prayed administration with the will annexed to be granted to the nominee of the Crown, but, there being no proof that the will was executed agreeably to the power, neither the settlement, nor a copy of it, being before the court, the motion was rejected.

By virtue of a marriage settlement, the wife's undivided share of certain freehold, copyhold, and leasehold estates of her father, bequeathed by his will upon trust for sale and conversion, was vested in trustees to pay the income therefrom to the wife during her life, and after her decease to the husband if he should survive her, and after the decease of the survivor in trust for all the children of that or any future marriage as the wife should, after the decease of the husband in case she should survive him, by any deed or deeds, writing or writings, or by her last will or testament and any codicil or codicils thereto, "or any writing in the nature of or purporting to be a will or codicil," direct or appoint. After the death of her husband she signed a written document which was expressed to be her "last will," and which, if valid as such, would have been an execution of the power, but, not having been sufficiently executed, it was not admitted to probate. The court said that the question in this case, which appeared to be of first impression, was as to the meaning of the words "purporting to be a will or codicil." That the peculiarity of the case was that the instrument creating the power contemplated the execution of it, first by a deed or writing not testamentary, then in the next place by a will or codicil,—that is to say, by a regular testamentary instrument, one which is not only in the nature of and purports to be, but which in a legal sense is, the will of the testator. But then the settlor is minded to extend the scope of the power, and he does so by saying that it may be exercised "by any writing in the nature of, or purporting to be, a will or codicil." To say that those words mean only a will or codicil is to destroy the effect of that addition; and the instrument was held to be a valid execution of the power. Re Broad [1901] 2 Ch. 86, 70 L. J. Ch. N. S. 601, 84 L. T. N. S. 577.

Where by a settlement made previous to marriage a woman had a power of appointment of certain stock, and made her will after her marriage whereby she disposed of the same, and afterwards made two testamentary papers, one of which was on unstamped paper and only signed by her; and thereafter, thinking it was material that her will should be upon stamped paper, on the same day made the second testamentary paper, in both of which she willed the stock to her husband for his sole use, the remaining part that was left, which he did not want for his own wants and use, to go to her brother and sisters; and thereafter, having fixed the two papers together with a wafer, requested two witnesses to attest the same, which they did, and she declared the same to be her will, and delivered the same to the person whom she had named in her original will as executor, who kept it until after her death,—it was held that these papers were a valid exercise of the appointment, and that the husband took the stock absolutely. Sprange v. Barnard, 2 Bro. Ch. 585.

Where the owner of an estate in land, either in law or equity, reserves to himself the power to dispose of it to such uses, as he by will shall appoint, that must be such a will as, within the statute of frauds, would be proper for a devise of land; but where two sons of full age, with their father, covenant and grant to trustees to charge the estate of the father with a sum for the benefit of younger children as the father shall appoint, his will, attested by two witnesses and not being such as would pass lands, is a valid exercise of the power. Jones v. Clough, 2 Ves. Sr. 365.

Where the language of a power did not require an attestation, but only that the will should be signed and published in the presence of two witnesses by the person invested with it, and did not require sealing, an instrument in the form of a will, admitted to have been signed by the person possessing the power, with the names of three witnesses upon it, and also appearing to have been signed by the person possessing the power with a testamentary intention, is a good execution of the power to dispose of personal estate by a will to be signed and published by the appointer in the presence of two or more credible witnesses. Warren v. Postlethwaite, 2 Colly. Ch. Cas. 108, 14 L. J. Ch. N. S. 422, 9 Jur. 721.

A will by which the testator assumes to exercise the power of appointment given by a previous indenture, by which the testator reserved a life estate, and after her death for such person or persons, interest or interests, as the testator, by any deed or deeds, writing or writings, should direct or appoint, is a writing within the provisions of the act 7 Wm. IV. & 1 Vict. Buckell v. Blenkhorn, 5 Hare, 131.

Previous to considering the effect of the statute upon the facts of this case, the vice chancellor said: "It cannot, at this day, admit of doubt that the will would, before the late statute (7 Wm. IV. & 1 Vict. chap. 26), have been a writing within the terms of the indenture of the 1st of September, 1843, and that such will would, therefore, before that statute, have been a due execution of the power reserved by that deed, provided the will had been executed with the formalities which the deed required."

Where two modes were prescribed by the donor of the power of appointment, the one to be by will duly executed according to law, the other by a testamentary paper in the nature of a will, to be executed in the presence of two witnesses, without anything more, a testamentary paper attested by three witnesses, which specifically refers to the power in the deed, and professes to be in execution of it, and which has been admitted to probate, seems to be sufficient to gratify either mode of executing the power. Schley v. McCeney, 36 Md. 266.

Where, by a marriage settlement, a woman was invested with a power of appointment by her last will and testament, in writing, or by any codicil or codicils thereto, by her "signed and published in the presence of and attested by three or more credible witnesses," a delivery is equivalent to publication of the will; and where the attestation stated the will to be signed, sealed, and delivered by the testatrix in the presence of three subscribing witnesses, such will was a due execution of the power. Curtels v. Kenrick, 7 L. J. Exch. N. S. 169, 3 Mees. & W. 461.

Where, by a marriage settlement, a power of appointment is created to be executed by will, the court of chancery is concluded by the decision of the ecclesiastical court that an instrument whereby the donee of the power assumes to execute the same is a will, and bound to consider it as a valid execution of the power if it appears to have been executed with the formalities prescribed by the power. Douglas v. Cooper, 3 Myl. & K. 378.

While a feme covert has the power of disposing of a sum of money, or any other thing, by a writing purporting to be a will, yet, after the wife's death, proving it in the spiritual court will not give it the authority of a will, but it will still be considered as an instrument only, or an appointment of such sum or other thing in pursuance of the power. Henley v. Phillips, 2 Atk. 48.

Where a married woman, by the settlement on her marriage, was invested with the power of appointment, to be executed by a will signed and published in the presence of, and attested by, three witnesses, her will concluding with this declaration, "this is my last will and testament," and expressed to be signed by the testatrix in the presence of the three attesting witnesses, was not a good appointment, because the publication was not attested. Stanhope v. Keir, 2 Sim. & Stu. 37, 2 L. J. Ch. 186.

But in Re Wrey, 17 Sim. 201, 19 L. J. Ch. N. S. 183, the court held that, where the power to appoint by will which was required to be signed and published by the testator in the presence of,

and attested by, three or more credible witnesses was given, and, the will of the testator was signed by him in the presence of, and attested by, the three witnesses, but without the attestation taking notice of the publication, the power was, nevertheless, well executed.

Where the power was vested in a testatrix to appoint, under her marriage settlement, certain real estate for such estate or estates as she might appoint, to be sealed and delivered by her in the presence of, and attested by, two or more credible witnesses at any time during her life, such power is well exercised by a will made before the wills act, and delivered and signed and published in the presence of three witnesses. Orange v. Pickford, 4 Drew. 363, 27 L. J. Ch. N. S. 808, 4 Jur. N. S. 649, 6 Week. Rep. 738.

In Bartholomew v. Harris, 15 Sim. 78, 15 L. J. Ch. N. S. 106, the requirement was that the will, in order to be a good appointment of a sum of stock, should be signed and published by the donee of the power in the presence of, and attested by, two or more credible witnesses. The will of the donee appeared, on the face of it, to have been signed by him, but did not, either in the body or at the conclusion of it, purport to have been published by him; and the clause attesting his execution was signed by three witnesses, and was as follows: "We, the undersigned, attest to have seen the above testator sign the above will." This was a sufficient attestation, and made it sufficiently appear that the will was signed as well as published, and was therefore a good execution of the power.

Lands which, by a marriage settlement, were limited to such uses as the wife, by her will, to be by her signed, sealed, and published in the presence of, and attested by, three or more credible witnesses, should appoint, are legally conveyed and appointed by an instrument commencing thus: "I, L., do publish and declare this to be my last will and testament;" and ending: "I declare this one to be my last will and testament. In witness whereof I have to this my last will and testament set my hand and seal the 12th day," etc.; the attestation being "Witness C. B., E. B., A. B." Doe ex dem. Spilsbury v. Burdett, 4 Ad. & El. 11, 6 Nev. & M. 259, 6 L. J. K. B. N. S. 73.

And so, too, a will expressed to be "signed, sealed, published, and declared" is a good execution of a power to appoint by deed or will "signed, sealed, and delivered." Mason v. Heywood, 7 L. J. Ch. N. S. 145.

2. What law governs.

(a) Formal validity of donee's will.

As has already been stated (supra, I. f.), the question whether a will by the terms of which it is claimed that a power of appointment has been exercised, has been properly executed, is dependent for decision upon the law of the domicile of the donee of the power. And it may be safely said that the weight of judicial authority is to that effect; or, at least that a will well executed according to the law of the domicile of the donee of the power will be deemed a valid will, in considering the question as to whether it exercises a power of appointment.

Where an English lady had the power of appointment over personal property in England, consisting of government funds, and married a resident of France, and thereafter became 64 L. R. A.

domiciled in the latter country with her husband, and there made a holographic will unattested, which was a valid will according to the law of her domicile, but not according to the law of England; but which, on account of its being a good will by the law of her domicile, had been admitted to probate in England, and which in terms was a good exercise of the power,—her will was a valid execution of the power of appointment. D'Huart v. Harkness, 34 Beav. 324, 5 New Reports, 440, 34 L. J. Ch. N. S. 311, 11 Jur. N. S. 633, 13 Week. Rep. 513.

A person who, by the provisions of a will, was entitled to the income of a trust fund, with power by her last will to appoint, the fund, in default of such appointment, to go to such person or persons as would at the time of her decease be her next of kin in case she had died intestate and unmarried; who at the date of the will giving her such power was the wife of a French subject domiciled in France,—after the death of her husband married another French subject domiciled in France, and thereafter made a holographic will in the French language, whereby she bequeathed to her then husband everything which she possessed, or might thereafter possess; and afterwards made a holographic codicil to such will, the will and codicil both being unattested, and died; and letters of administration with the will annexed were afterwards admitted by the probate division to the attorney of the husband. It was held that, as a power to appoint by will simply, may be executed by any will which, according to the law, is valid, though it does not follow the forms of the statute provided by §§ 9 and 10 of the act 7 Wm. IV. & 1 Vict. chap. 26, § 27, and this will having been held valid for the reason that, although unattested as required in this section, yet it was, by the law of France where it was executed, a valid will upon which letters of administration had been granted in England by the proper tribunal, it was competent for the testatrix to execute the power by a will in this form, notwithstanding the sections mentioned; and that the same rules of construction would be applied to it as to a will executed in England in the same terms and of the same date, including that directed by § 27 of the said act; and that, therefore, the general bequest was an exercise of the power in favor of the husband. The court approved D'Huart v. Harkness, 34 Beav. 324, 5 New Reports, 440, 34 L. J. Ch. N. S. 311, 11 Jur. N. S. 633, 13 Week. Rep. 513. supra, and distinguished Re Kirwan, L. R. 25 Ch. S. 518, infra, on the ground that in those cases the wills owed their validity to the act 24 & 25 Vict. 114. Re Price [1900] 1 Ch. 442, 69 L. J. Ch. N. S. 225, 82 L. T. N. S. 79, 48 Week. Rep. 373.

Where by a settlement a sum was settled by an English woman married to a French subject upon trust to pay the income thereof to her during her life, and after her death in trust for all such or any such one or more of her issue by any husband, whether children or more remote issue, born within legal limits, as she should by deed or will appoint, the trustees of the settlement being English, and the trust funds in England; and she, while in France, executed a will in the English form, reciting the power of appointment and purporting to exercise it, among other things, in favor of her daughter; and the probate court had held that she was a domiciled French woman, but that her will was a due execution of the power, and must be admitted to probate (see Huber's Goods [1896] Prob. 209, 65 L. J. Prob. N. S. 119, 75 L. T. N. S. 453, infra), and issued and granted letters of administration with the will annexed to the daughter,—such a will is a valid exercise of the power of appointment reserved by the testatrix to herself by the settlement. The court agreed with Sterling, J., in Re Price [1900] 1 Ch. 442, 69 L. J. Ch. N. S. 225, 82 L. T. N. S. 79, 48 Week. Rep. 373, supra, who came to the same conclusion in a similar case where the power was general, and said that, if a foreign testatrix can exercise a general power, a fortiori can she exercise a special power. Pouey v. Hordern [1900] 1 Ch. 492, 69 L. J. Ch. N. S. 231, 82 L. T. N. S. 51.

In Huber's Goods [1896] Prob. 209, 65 L. J. Prob. N. S. 119, 75 L. T. N. S. 453, a proceeding in the probate court for the granting of letters of administration with the will annexed, where the will was that considered in Pouey v. Hordern [1900] 1 Ch. 492, 69 L. J. Ch. N. S. 231, 82 L. T. N. S. 51, supra, and, in considering whether the letters should be issued, the president of the probate divorce and admiralty division of the high court of justice held that the letters must be granted as it was impossible to say that the will was not valid, considered as an execution of the power,—the court followed Alexander's Goods, 29 L. J. Prob. N. S. 93, 6 Jur. N. S. 345, 2 L. T. N. S. 56, 8 Week. Rep. 451, infra, in which case—as is stated in a note—Cresswell, J., compared and discussed what he had said in Crookenden v. Fuller, 1 Swabey & T. 441, 29 L. J. Prob. N. S. 1, 5 Jur. N. S. 1222, 1 L. T. N. S. 70, 8 Week. Rep. 49, and also, after stating that the marginal note to Tatnall v. Hankey, 2 Moore P. C. C. 342, infra, that “a will disposing of personal estate situate in this country, made in pursuance of a power of appointment, and executed in compliance with the requisites of the power, is entitled to probate, though not executed according to the testamentary law of the domicile of the party making it,” further stated that the judgment of the judicial committee, as reported in Moore, did not bear out that proposition, such judgment being that the judicial committee was of the opinion that the court below had the jurisdiction which it repudiated, and that, so far, the sentence of the prerogative court must be reversed; and that he had been furnished with a copy of the actual report made by the judicial committee, which did give the express opinion of the very point stated in the headnote, viz., that the validity of the will in question, so far as regards the appointment of the residue of the personal estate, did not depend upon the law of the domicile of the donee of the power and testatrix at the time of her decease, and said that this express opinion of the judicial committee was conclusive, and relieved him from all difficulty. The same note states that the following is from Dodd & Brook, Probate Court Practice, pp. 227, 228: “The judgment of the judicial committee in Tatnall v. Hankey, as reported by Mr. Moore, turns wholly upon the jurisdiction of the court of probate in respect of testamentary appointments, and determines merely that the court below had the jurisdiction which it repudiated. The report made by their lordships to the Queen in council goes somewhat further than Mr. Moore's. . . . Their lordships did agree humbly to report their opinion to Your Majesty against the appeal, . . . that the validity of the will of the said Harriet Drummond, deceased, so far as regards the appointment of the residue of the personal estates of the said Charles Boone, deceased, does not depend upon the law of the domicile of the said Harriet Drummond at the time of her decease.”

In Alexander's Goods, 29 L. J. Prob. N. S. 93, 6 Jur. N. S. 345, 2 L. T. N. S. 56, 8 Week. Rep. 451, Sir C. Cresswell held that where a will bequeathed to trustees a sum of money upon trust to pay the dividends to the testator's daughter for life, and thereafter to any husband of hers who should survive her for his life, in case she should by her will so direct and appoint, and the daughter thereafter married, and by her will executed the power in favor of her husband, she being a resident of England, but at the time of her death domiciled in Scotland, it being valid according to the law of Scotland, but not that of England, was a valid exercise of the power of appointment; saying that he took the opportunity of correcting what fell from him in Crookenden v. Fuller, 29 L. J. Prob. N. S. 1, 1 Swabey & T. 441, 5 Jur. N. S. 1222, 1 L. T. N. S. 70, 8 Week. Rep. 49, in reference to this question, which he found was not warranted; that in that case one of the arguments urged in favor of the will was, that it was, except a certain portion, made in pursuance of a power, and, therefore, that the rule of law which requires a will to be executed in accordance with the law of the domicile did not apply to it. That the decision in Crookenden v. Fuller did not turn on that point; but that he expressed an opinion that, if it did, the court would have to see that the will was duly executed in conformity with the law of the domicile, before it granted probate.

Where a person having a general power of appointment over real estate which was afterwards sold under an act of Parliament, and the proceeds, liable to be laid out in the purchase of land, were invested in certain stock, the donee of the power, who was domiciled in France, made her will in the French language, by which she disposed of all her property and chattels. It was held that such a will disposed of all her personal property over which she had the general power of appointment, and that the fund invested in stock was personal in form, and passed by the will. Re Harman [1894] 3 Ch. 607, 63 L. J. Ch. N. S. 822, 8 Reports, 549, 71 L. T. N. S. 401. The court said that, treating this as an English will, it exercised the general power of appointment conferred on the testatrix by the will creating the power. But that it was not an English will. That it was the will of a French woman; and, in construing it, the court must have regard to French law, and to the rules of construction by which a French court would be guided in determining the meaning and effect of such an instrument.

A woman who had been adopted when a child in poor circumstances by a wealthy lady, and had been left a fortune, which was in the hands of the guardian and trustee under the will of her mother by adoption, executed a deed of trust to a trust company with the knowledge and approbation of her intended husband, whom she afterwards married, by which she directed one half of her property, which was still held by the guardian and trustee under the will of her said mother, to be paid over and delivered to the trust company as soon as it was freed from the trust created by the mother's will, to be held by the company in trust for her during her life, the income to be paid to her, and from and after her death to convey, assign, and deliver the same to such person or persons as she by her last will and testament, or by instrument in the nature of a will, executed in the presence of two witnesses, might limit, nominate, and appoint; and finally, in case she should die without executing a will or instrument as aforesaid, to convey the same to her heirs and next of kin. After the marriage she and her husband took up their residence in Switzerland, where the wife made a holographic will in which she stated that, in case she should die without posterity, she nominated and constituted her husband, naming him, her sole legatee of everything. Thereafter, while temporarily stopping in France, she made a holographic codicil by which she bequeathed certain small legacies to friends, and expressed her desire "that all my fortune, as well that placed in the Safe Deposit & Trust Company, Baltimore, Maryland, U. S. of America, as the rest thereof, be handed over at my death to my husband, Alfred Olivet, my sole legatee," and the next day she wrote a letter to her former trustee and guardian announcing what she had done in reference to her will and codicil. The will and codicil were a valid will according to the law of Switzerland, but not according to the law of Maryland. It was held that it was a valid execution of the power reserved in the deed of trust, which did not require that a will valid according to the general law should also be executed in the presence of two witnesses. Olivet v. Whitworth, 82 Md. 258, 33 Atl. 723.

Where a testator, a citizen of one of the United States, left a sum in trust to invest the same and pay the income to his wife during her life, and upon her decease one half of the sum to such person and in such manner as she by her last will and testament, duly executed according to the law of her domicile, might order and appoint; and his widow, the donee of the power, thereafter married, and removed, and was domiciled in France,—her will, executed there according to the laws of that country, would, so far as the character of the instrument is concerned, be a valid execution of the power. Aubert's Appeal, 109 Pa. 447, 1 Atl. 336.

Where the right to dispose of personal property has been reserved to a married woman by an indenture made, previous to her marriage, between her and her husband in contemplation of the marriage, a will not under seal, without the intervention of a third party as trustee, is a valid exercise of the power, although at the time of entering into the contract and of the marriage the parties resided in another state, by the laws of which state a disposition by will under contract would be ineffectual unless made under seal. Ela v. Edwards, 16 Gray, 91.

As will be seen by the two cases next following, it was held that a will which in its execution did not comply with the provisions of §§ 9 and 10 of the wills act (7 Wm. IV. & 1 & 2 Vict.) was ineffectual to execute a power of appointment which was to be exercised by a duly executed will; and in the one case, that this was so, notwithstanding it might be admissible to probate as a foreign will under another statute.

All that the act 24 & 25 Vict. chap. 114, does, is to make a will executed abroad by a British subject a good will if it be such document as is recognized to be a will by the law of that place; but it does not at all touch or interfere with the negative provision in the wills act (7 Wm. IV. & 1 & 2 Vict. chap. 26), that no testamentary appointment can be made unless it is attested by two witnesses. And in Re Kirwan, L. R. 25 Ch. Div. 373, 52 L. J. Ch. N. S. 952, 49 L. T. N. S. 292, 32 Week. Rep. 581, supra, II. a, 1, infra, II. k, it was held that a codicil to a will executed by such a person domiciled in France, unattested, was ineffectual to execute a power of appointment, which was to be exercised by a duly executed will.

By her father's will a woman had a general power of appointment over a share of his residuary estate, and after his death she married an Austrian subject, who afterwards deserted, and never subsequently lived with her, and she died without issue in France, having there made a disposition of her property by writing signed by her, but not attested, which was in form a valid will according to French law. It was held that the writing did not operate as an execution by the daughter of her general power of appointment by will, as it had not been attested as required by §§ 9 and 10 of the wills act (7 Wm. IV. & 1 Vict. chap. 26), and this notwithstanding it might be admissible to probate under § 1 of 24 & 25 Vict. chap. 114. Hummel v. Hummel [1898] 1 Ch. 642, 67 L. J. Ch. N. S. 363, 78 L. T. N. S. 518.

The court cited and approved Re Kirwan, L. R. 25 Ch. Div. 373, 52 L. J. Ch. N. S. 952, 49 L. T. N. S. 292, 32 Week. Rep. 581, supra, II. a, 1, infra, II. k, and assumed to distinguish D'Huart v. Harkness, 34 Beav. 324, 5 New Reports, 440, 34 L. J. Ch. N. S. 311, 11 Jur. N. S. 633, 13 Week. Rep. 518, supra, admitting that the two cases were apparently conflicting.

But it must not be supposed, however, that it necessarily follows that a will executed by one domiciled in a foreign jurisdiction, but not in accordance with the law of that jurisdiction, is, therefore, invalid when it is otherwise effectual as an exercise of a power of appointment. In a case decided by the privy council in 1838, it was stated that the principle which governs the constitution of powers, and their very nature, is that, whatever is given by the donor of a power, in execution of that power, passes to the appointee, or the party in whose favor the power is executed by the donor, but is conveyed, not by force of the appointment, or by any act of the donee, but by the act of the donor of the power, by virtue, in fact, of the power, and not of the appointment under it; and it was held that a will disposing of personal estate situated in England, made in pursuance of a power of appointment, and executed in compliance with the requisites of the power, is a good exercise of that power, although executed by a party domiciled in a foreign country, and not according to the testamentary law of that country. Tatnall v. Hankey, 2 Moore P. C. C. 342.

The donor of a power may prescribe the particular mode in which it is to be exercised, and unless the mode prescribed is strictly complied with, there can be no valid execution of the power; and so, where the mode prescribed by the donor of the power is expressed in the words "by her last will and testament duly executed," by these words are meant a will duly executed according to the laws of the state which is the domicile of the donor, and in which the property which is the subject of the power is situated. In this case the donor of the power resided and her property was in South Carolina, and the donee of the power resided in the state of North Carolina. The donee of the power executed a will valid by the state of her domicile, but not by the laws of the state of the residence of the donor. It was held that this was not the will contemplated by the donor of the power when she created it and was, therefore, invalid as an exercise of it. Blount v. Walker, 28 S. C. 545, 6 S. E. 558.

A vigorous dissent was written by Simpson,

Ch. J., citing and approving D'Huart v. Harkness, 34 Beav. 324, 5 New Reports, 440, 84 L. J. Ch. N. S. 311, 11 Jur. N. S. 633, 13 Week. Rep. 513, and distinguishing Bingham's Appeal, 64 Pa. 345, on the ground that in the present case the question was one of intention on the part of the donor as to the form in which the power should be executed. That she had a right to give the donee the power to make an appointment by her will duly executed in any state, valid according to its laws; and the question was whether she did grant such a power; while in Bingham's Appeal the question was one of law, as to the proper construction of the alleged executed power, to wit, whether the will, as executed by the donee, not mentioning the estate over which he had the power, carried said estate.

This is probably the only case holding that the will, in order to be "duly executed," must be executed according to the law of the domicile of the donor of the power; and that, if it is not, it will be insufficient to exercise the power, although executed according to the law of the domicile of the donee thereof.

The will of a person resident in France, which, though unattested, is a good testamentary disposition by the law of that country, but which would not be entitled to probate in England, is insufficient as a power of appointment of property contained in an English marriage settlement, the property also being situated in England. Re Daly, 25 Beav. 458, 27 L. J. Ch. N. S. 751, 4 Jur. N. S. 525, 6 Week. Rep. 533. In this case the donee of the power was a married woman living separate from her husband, but without any legal separation, and the court held that her domicile was that of her husband, which was in England.

Where formalities are required by the instrument creating a power of appointment, such as that it must be attested by two or more credible witnesses, such a power is not exercised by the will of the donee thereof domiciled in France, valid according to the French law, but invalid according to English law, because not attested by witnesses; such a case being one where the provision of the act 7 Wm. IV. & 1 Vict. chap. 26, does not apply; as a will, in order to exercise the power, must comply with the terms of the instrument creating it. Barretto v. Young [1900] 2 Ch. 339, 69 L. J. Ch. N. S. 605, 83 L. T. N. S. 154.

But in several of the states statute and Code provisions have been enacted to the effect that a will will operate as an exercise of a power of appointment if it conforms in all respects to the requirements of the law of the state regarding the execution of wills, although it may not meet all the provisions of the instrument creating the power.

(b) Essential validity of donee's will.

In the two cases following the question which arose as to what law governs their disposition was neither as to which law governed as to the formal execution of the will, nor as to whether the intent of the donee to execute the power was expressed, but as to whether the will was essentially valid as an execution of the power; and even this is vaguely evident in the report of the first case, the question there decided seeming to be, what law governed as to what was the effect of an appointment. In Re Eald, 76 L. T. N. S. 483, 66 L. J. Ch. N. S. 524, 45 Week. Rep. 499, the real question in 54 L. R. A.

the case was whether the English or Scotch law was to govern. The question was whether the appointed funds were assets going to creditors, or whether they went to the appointees, and, in holding that they were well appointed, the court decided that a general power of appointment created by a Scottish will must be governed by Scottish law, whatever might be the domicile of the donee of the power, the court saying: "The Scotch law applies, even though the person exercising the power may have been a domiciled Englishman, and may have exercised it by an English will."

In Re Megret [1901] 1 Ch. 547, 70 L. J. Ch. N. S. 451, 84 L. T. N. S. 192, in contemplation of a marriage between a domiciled English woman and a domiciled Frenchman, a settlement of personal property belonging to the intended wife was executed in English form, the trustees were English, and the property subject to it was and remained English. The settlement gave the wife a general testamentary power of appointment over the settled property, which was given to her for her separate use in default of appointment. There was issue of the marriage, a son and three daughters. The wife made a will in English form, and executed according to English requirements, whereby she appointed the whole of the trust fund. The will, however, was executed in a manner that to some extent would not be permitted by the law of France if it were her own absolute property. It was held that the will was a good exercise of the power given by the settlement. The court cited and approved what was stated in Pouey v. Hordern [1900] 1 Ch. 192, 69 L. J. Ch. N. S. 231, 82 L. T. N. S. 51, supra, II. a, 1, (a), and also in Re Bald, 66 L. J. Ch. N. S. 524, 45 Week. Rep. 499, 76 L. T. N. S. 462.

b. When limited to a class.

1. Exclusion of member of class.

If the creator, or, as he is usually termed, the donor, of a power of appointment by will, has, in the instrument creating the power, designated a class of persons among whom the subject of the power is to be appointed, the provisions of a will which excludes any of the class will not be a valid execution of the power.

Under a will a person had the power of appointing, by deed or will, a sum of money amongst all and every, or such one or more exclusively, of the others or other of his children, as he should direct, and, in default of appointment, the sum was given among the children equally; and by his will he gave, devised, and bequeathed all his freehold and other messuages, etc., and all his household goods, etc., and all other his real and personal estate and effects whatsoever and wheresoever, or of what nature or kind soever, and whether in possession, reversion, remainder, or expectancy, unto his son, according to the nature of the several estates and effects respectively. There were two other children, and the court held that, if this had been a power to appoint in any manner he might think proper, the power would have been properly executed, but that it was not, but was a power to appoint amongst his children in such manner as he should think proper, and is of quite a different nature. That the power did not come within the provision of the act of Parliament (7 Wm. IV. & 1 Vict. chap. 26, § 27), and was, therefore, not executed by the will. Cloves v. Awdry, 12 Beav. 604.

A testator, after bequeathing all his personal property to his wife absolutely, inserted this clause in his will: "Having full confidence that she will leave the surplus to be divided at her decease justly among my children." The power of appointment thus created was not exercised by a will of the wife, in which she bequeathed the same to some of the children only, as it was not even an ostensible attempt to execute her power. McKonkey's Appeal, 13 Pa. 259.

Where a married woman, by her will purporting to be in pursuance of a power with which she was invested, appointed a certain fund to her three children in such manner as her husband should appoint, and he, by his will, appointed the whole fund to two only, such appointment was bad on account of the exclusion of the third. White v. Wilson, 1 Drew. 298, 22 L. J. Ch. N. S. 62, 17 Jur. 15, 1 Week. Rep. 47.

Where the language of a will was, "my will being that my said daughter shall in such case have power to dispose of the same [residue] among her brothers and sisters, and their children, in such proportions as she may think fit, but to no other person or persons whatsoever," it was claimed that this was not intended to qualify or limit the power of appointment previously conferred, but was meant only as a more emphatic designation of the objects to which the appointment was to be confined; but the court held that the language was too direct and unequivocal to admit of this construction; that the testatrix used the words "among her brothers and sisters," which was inconsistent with the exclusive appointment, standing as the words do, without any qualification to its natural import and significance. The position of the word "such," in the sentence, confines the direction of the donee to the proportions; and the donee having failed to leave any part of the fund to three of the designated class, it was held that the power had not been properly executed. Lippincott v. Ridgway, 10 N. J. Eq. 164.

Where a testator, by his will, gave his real and personal estate to trustees upon trust for his three daughters, with the provision that, in case either should leave issue, then she or they should appoint their share or shares unto such child or children in such manner and form as she or they should choose; and one of them, by her will, appointed a part of the fund to the son of a deceased daughter,—this was held to be a valid exercise of the power, as the expression "issue" is the largest possible, and includes descendants at any distance. Harley v. Mitford, 21 Beav. 280.

Where a power is given to appoint among children or issue, although there is no express gift over in default of appointment, it is not disputed that in such case there is an implied gift to a class as objects of the power, it being considered that the object is to give to them, subject to the exercise of the power. Where a testator, by his will, provided that in a certain contingency the property should go in such manner, and among such issue, as his granddaughter should by deed or will appoint, and the donee of the power appointed property by will among some only of her issue living at her decease, such appointment was void for exclusiveness. The court said that the nearest case to this was Harley v. Mitford, 21 Beav. 280, supra, in which it was held that an exclusive appointment was authorized; and said that, without saying a word as to whether, if that case had come before him, he should have so decided, he should decide this case against the exclusive power. Stolworthy v. 64 L. R. A.

Sancroft, 10 Jur. N. S. 762, 33 L. J. Ch. N. S. 708, 10 L. T. N. S. 223, 12 Week. Rep. 635.

The donee of a power of appointment under the will of his father, which bequeathed to the executors thereof a portion of his residuary estate upon trust to pay, upon the death of his son, the capital thereof to such son's children in such proportion as the son should decide by his last will and testament, has not only the right to apportion the capital between all his children,—as well those of his then existing marriage as those of any future marriage,—but has, also, the right to dispose of the property in favor of one or more of his children to the exclusion of the others. McGibbon v. Abbott, L. R. 10 App. Cas. 653, 54 L. J. P. C. N. S. 39, 54 L. T. N. S. 138. This was an appeal from the Queen's bench of Canada, and, in delivering the opinion of the privy council, Sir Barnes Peacock said that the courts in Lower Canada are not bound by the current of decisions in England, as the judges in England before 1874, and Lord Alvanley in the case of Kemp v. Kemp, 5 Ves. Jr. 861, 5 Revised Rep. 182, considered themselves to be bound in deciding whether a power was exclusive or nonexclusive; that even in England those decisions had caused so much inconvenience that it was found necessary to resort to legislation upon the subject and the law was amended by act 37 & 38 Vict. chap. 37. He said, further, it would be lamentable if their lordships, in a case arising in Lower Canada and to be determined by the law of that country, should feel themselves bound by a course of English decisions which have been swept away by the legislature as fraught with inconvenience and mischief, and thus be driven to such a construction of the will of the father in this case as would form a precedent in future cases of a similar nature, and thereby introduce into Lower Canada all those difficulties and inconveniences which it required the force of an act of Parliament in England to remove.

Where a wife, by her will, devised and bequeathed her property to her husband's trustee, with full power to her husband to use, sell, control, exchange, and reinvest, using the interest and income therefrom as he might choose for the support of himself and their children and grandchildren during his life; and he was also empowered to dispose of any or all of said property, or the proceeds from the sale thereof, as he might choose, among the children and grandchildren during his lifetime, and at his death to dispose of it, or what remained of it, among the children and grandchildren by will in such proportions to each as he might choose, giving the same power to divide the estate among their heirs, children, and grandchildren as she herself had,—under such a power, the husband had no right or authority to exclude any child or grandchildren absolutely from sharing in the estate; but where, by his will, he gave a portion to each of them, and after making his will, he made a codicil in which he stated that, one son having received his full share of the estate of his wife, as well as his own, he willed that that son should have no part of either of said estates,—his wife's or his own,—it was contended that the recital in the codicil, to the effect that he had already received his full share of the estate, could not be considered. This was held to be error; that by the will and codicil the husband clearly evinced his intention to execute the power vested in him by the will of his wife, and if it were true, as stated in the will, that the son had received his full share, he had no semblance of right to another, and prima facie the power of appointment had been fairly and legally executed. Hatchett v. Hatchett, 103 Ala. 556, 16 So. 550.

Where a sum was bequeathed by a will to trustees for a woman for life, and on her death in trust for her three children in such shares as she should by will or codicil appoint, and, in default of appointment, in trust for her three children equally as tenants in common; and she by a codicil to her will appointed two sixths of the fund in trust to pay the income to her son, and after his death for his children, and, in default of children, in trust, to be equally divided between all her children and grandchildren then living per capita, and one sixth for each of her two daughters; and then declared that she made no appointment of the other two-sixths parts of the whole sum bequeathed by the original testator, as she wished those parts to pass directly to her two daughters so as to give them an immediate, vested, and disposable interest therein; and also declared that neither her son nor his children (if any) should take any share or interest in the said unappointed parts of the said trust funds,—as to those two-sixths parts there was no exercise of the power, and they went to her son and two daughters as unappointed. Re Jack [1899] 1 Ch. 374, 68 L. J. Ch. N. S. 188, 80 L. T. N. S. 321. The court said that it appeared that the donee of the power had acted under a mistake, and appeared to have thought that if she did not appoint the balance of the fund, it would go to the two daughters; but that it was impossible to say that, under the codicil of her will, she did, in effect, appoint the balance of the fund by implication when she had expressly said that the balance was unappointed.

Where a testator, by his will, gave his wife the power of appointment of his estate among his children in certain proportions, the will of the wife, which disposes of the estate in a different manner or proportion, is not a valid execution of the power. Ketchin v. Rion (S. C.) 47 S. E. 376.

2. Inclusion of nonmember.

On the other hand, where the appointment has been so limited to a class, an attempt to exercise the power by a will which includes persons or parties not of the designated class will also be invalid as an execution of the power; and when, and under what circumstances, the appointment will be held void as a whole, or only as to those not objects of the power, will be found in the cases in this subdivision.

Where a testator, by his will, gave to his wife all his estate, both real and personal, in trust to manage the estate, at her discretion, for the support of herself and to raise and educate the children, with the power to her to dispose of it among all of the children as their circumstances might seem to require, the will of the wife, giving the property to the grandchildren of her husband and other remote descendants, was not a valid exercise of the power, and the appointments under it were inoperative and void. Little v. Bennett, 58 N. C. (5 Jones, Eq.) 156.

Where one possessing the power of appointment under a will, by her will bequeathed certain legacies, which was held to be a valid exercise of the power, and bequeathed a sum to one who was not an object of the power, and thereafter appointed the balance of the fund to which the power related,—it was held that the sum bequeathed to the one not an object of the power was unappointed, and did not pass to the 64 L. R. A.

legatee of the balance of the fund, but, aside from that, the balance did pass to such legatee (who was a proper object of the power), freed from a charge of debts which the will sought to impose upon it. Re Jeaffreson, L. R. 2 Eq. 276, 12 Jur. N. S. 660, 14 Week. Rep. 759.

Where a person possessed of the power of appointment by will over a trust fund, limited to her children only, by her will proceeded to appoint to three of her children one fourth each, and the remaining one fourth to a grandchild, and all the rest, residue, and remainder of her personal estate and effects, and over which she had any power of disposal by her will, to two of her three children before mentioned, the appointment of the one fourth to the grandchild was invalid, as such grandchild was not an object of the limited power, and the same went, by virtue of a residuary clause in the will, to the two children, who took the residuum of her other shares, and also any personal estate. Re Hunt, L. R. 31 Ch. Div. 308, 55 L. J. Ch. N. S. 280, 54 L. T. N. S. 69, 84 Week. Rep. 247.

Where, by the instrument creating the power of appointment, such power is made a special one, and the donee of the power assumes to appoint to persons who are not the objects of the power, such an appointment is invalid. And where such power is exercised by will, if it is apparent that the intention of the testator was that if, for any reason whatever, anyone of the beneficiaries under her will, could not take any part of that which was given to him by the will, that which he could not take should go over to the other beneficiaries under the will who were capable of taking it. Re Swinburne, L. R. 27 Ch. Div. 696, 54 L. J. Ch. N. S. 229, 33 Week. Rep. 394.

Where a power of appointment by will limited the objects of the appointment to the children of the donee of the power, naming them, such power cannot be exercised by the will of the donee in favor of her grandchildren, and such an attempted exercise of the power will not be rendered valid by the provision of the Code, that "when a disposition under an appointment or power is directed to be made to the children of any person, without restricting it to any particular children, it may be exercised in favor of the grandchildren or other descendants of such person." Thorington v. Hall, 111 Ala. 323, 56 Am. St. Rep. 54, 21 So. 835.

Where one has a power of appointment under the will of a testator which is not a general power, but the donee is not enabled to select the object of the original testator's bounty, nor even the class out of which those objects could be selected, as where they were the children of the donee who might be living at his death, and the issue of any child or children then deceased, there having been no such issue, the children of the donee are the sole objects of the power, and an appointment outside of them—that is, to grandchildren—will not be a valid exercise thereof. Horwitz v. Norris, 49 Pa. 213.

A power of appointment to children does not embrace grandchildren, and the exercise of it in their favor is without authority, and void. Cruise v. McKee, 2 Head, 1, 73 Am. Dec. 186.

A power of appointment to children does not authorize an appointment to grandchildren. Jarnagin v. Conway, 2 Humph. 50.

A power to appoint to children will not authorize an appointment to grandchildren, or other persons, unless such an intention appears from the instrument creating the power. Hood v. Haden, 82 Va. 588.

A power of appointment limited to the children of the donee of the power is not well exercised by a bequest, in the will of such donee, to a son-in-law. Ratchliffe v. Hampson, 1 Jur. N. S. 1104, 4 Week. Rep. 67.

Where one has the power of appointment under a will limited to nephews and nieces, such power is not well exercised by a disposition of the property to which the power related to great nephews and great nieces. Falkner v. Butler, 1 Ambl. 514.

Where a testator in his will provided a trust for his six children for life, with power to each to appoint by a last will and testament his or her share of the residuary estate to any one or more of his or her child or children, or descendants, to the exclusion in whole or in part of any other or others of such child or children, or descendants, such power is not well executed by an appointment to issue of living children of the donees. Fotterall's Estate, 12 Pa. Co. Ct. 548.

Where a testator by his will, gave to his wife a power of appointment among the brothers and sisters of himself and his wife, and their descendants, and she, by her will, after reciting the power whereby, in exercise thereof, she gave a small legacy to each of the brothers and sisters of herself and her late husband, devised and bequeathed to another sister all the residue of her husband's and her own real and personal estate; but afterwards revoked this will, and by another, which did not recite the power, directed her debts and funeral expenses to be paid out of her personal estate; and, subject thereto, she gave to one of her nephews, the son of one of her sisters, who was living at her decease, and to one of her nieces, the daughter of one of her husband's brothers, who was living at her decease, a leasehold messuage and premises known by a particular name, which had formed part of her husband's residuary estate; and all of the husband's brothers and sisters were living at the time of his decease,—it was held that, while it was certain that, if any brother or sister had died before the wife, their children or grandchildren would be descendants, it was not so certain that the same word applied to, or meant, children or grandchildren of a brother or sister alive at the death of the wife; that the former meaning was certain, and that, being found consistent with a rational construction of a will, the use of the word "descendants" must be confined to that which was the most accurate meaning of it; and that the will of the wife entirely failed as an appointment. Tucker v. Billing, 2 Jur. N. S. 483.

Where a power of appointment conferred by will was therein made upon the condition that the person to whom the power was given should exercise it only in the event of his having children, an attempt on his part to exercise it without having children will be nugatory. Earle v. Barker, 11 H. L. Cas. 280, 13 L. T. N. S. 29, Affirming 33 Beav. 353.

A testator, by his will, settled one fourth of the proceeds of the sale of his residuary real and personal estate for the benefit of his daughter and her husband for life, and afterward for her children, with a gift over in default of children attaining a vested interest, with a general power of appointment to the daughter of a sum to be raised upon the estate; and she made her will stating that, in the exercise of such power, she gave and bequeathed said sum equally amongst eight persons, as tenants in common; and declared that if any of them should die in her lifetime leaving a child or children, such child or children were to be entitled to his or their parent's share, and appointed an executor. Two of the appointees having died in the lifetime of the testatrix, it was held that she had not indicated an intention to make this sum, so attempted to be disposed of by her, hers for all purposes, and that, so far as concerned the lapsed shares, they went as in default of appointment. The court followed Re Davies, L. R. 13 Eq. 163, 41 L. J. Ch. N. S. 97, 25 L. T. N. S. 785, 20 Week. Rep. 165, supra, I. c. and distinguished Re Pinède, L. R. 12 Ch. Div. 667, 48 L. J. Ch. N. In Grant v. Lyman, 4 Russ. Ch. 292, 6 L. J. Ch. 129, 28 Revised Rep. 97, the court held that, where the author of the power uses the term "family," the donee, who exercises the power, has a right of selection among the relations of the donor, although not within the degree of next of kin; and so, where the power was to appoint to such of the donor's family as the donee might think proper, the will of the donee giving to a relation of the donor, but not one of her next of kin, is a good execution of the power.

3. Illusory appointment; remoteness.

By the old English rule, when the appointment had been limited to a class by the donor of the power, to be exercised by will, the will of the donee of the power, in order to be a good execution of it, must not only have disposed of some portion of the subject of the power to every member of the designated class, but there must have been a substantial gift to each; and a nominal gift to one or more was said to be illusory, and would render the will invalid as an execution of the power. But under the later authorities, both in the United States and England, the doctrine of illusory appointment has been dispepelled; and, where the proportion of the subject of the power to be given to each member of the class named is left to the discretion of the donee of the power, a nominal gift to some of them will be a good execution thereof.

A widow who, by the will of her husband, had a power of appointment of personality among his sons as she should think fit, by her will gave personal estate to one of the sons, and only a small pecuniary legacy to the other two. Her will was held not to be an exercise of the power. Jones v. Jones, 10 Jur. 960.

The reason for this holding would seem to have been that the exercise of the power was illusory.

Where a testator, after disposing of a part of his estate, devised and bequeathed to his wife generally all the rest of his property and estate whatsoever, real and personal, during the term of her natural life, upon certain conditions, and then empowered her, by her last will and testament, or other instrument signifying her intention, to make some provision or portion to their orphan child, naming her, whom he commended to her good and generous heart, a devise by the wife, in her will, of two thirds of the estate of her husband to such child is a valid execution of such power, and is not excessive. The testator having left the nature and amount of the provision to the discretion of his wife his confidence in her must be held to have authorized any disposition in favor of the person for whose benefit the power was to be exercised, be it much or little. The court said further: "For after all that has been said and written on the subject of the execution of powers, the only principle which can be safely extracted from the cases is that, where a power of appointment is to be exercised according to the discretion of the person to whom it is committed, no appointment, however unjust and unreasonable it may seem, can be regarded as excessive; but, where any limitation is placed to the exercise of his discretion, the courts will control the execution of the power." Fronty v. Fronty, 1 Ball. Eq. 517 Appx.

In Cruise v. McKee, 2 Head, 1, 73 Am. Dec. 186, the court said that where one invested with a power to apportion property amongst a class, with full discretion as to the amount given to each, gives to one a merely nominal share, such appointment will be set aside as illusory, as a fraud upon the donor of the power, as the latter certainly intended, by making all the objects of his bounty, or of the power, that each should have a substantial share. This was entirely unnecessary to the decision of the real question involved, and, while some English cases have held this doctrine, it is believed not to be in line with most of the authorities on the subject.

Where a testator provided, by his will, that at the death of his wife one half of the property in her possession was to be divided equally between his heirs, and one half to be divided between her heirs, in the manner that she might decide; and she by her will, alluding to this provision of her husband's will, stated that she desired and decided and appointed that one niece should take all of the said one half, except that she bequeathed a comparatively nominal sum to each of her other heirs,—this was a valid execution of the powers of appointment conferred upon her by the will of her husband, as, while under this power each heir of the wife must take some thing, the portion which each must take was left to her discretion. The court condemned the doctrine of what is known as illusory appointment, and stated that, inasmuch as the doctrine had been discredited and reluctantly enforced by the English courts of equity until the steadily increasing dissatisfaction was recognized by a statute entirely forbidding its application, and in view of the further fact, that no case, as it seems, can be found in which it had ever been applied by an American court they were of the opinion that, in the light of all the authorities cited, and in consideration of the reasons which might make against the rule and its enforcement, they would not be warranted in ingrafting this doctrine of illusory appointment upon the laws of the state. Hawthorn v. Ulrich, 207 Ill. 430, 69 N. E. 885.

Where a testator made his will devising to a grandson for life, and after his decease to his heirs, a tract of land containing 311½ acres, to have and to hold the same to the grandson during life, and after his decease to his heirs and their heirs and assigns respectively forever, in such manner and shares as the grandson might see fit to divide it among them, which he should have full power to do, as he pleased; and the grandson, having two sons and two daughters, his only children, devised to one son 130 acres, to another 190 acres, and to each of the daughters a little more than 3 acres,—this was held to be a valid exercise of the power of appointment, and that the equitable rule of an illusory appointment, which was found in England so unsatisfactory and so difficult to administer, would not be introduced in this state. Græff v. De Turk, 44 Pa. 527.

A power to distribute among a class in such shares and in such manner as the donee sees fit is well exercised, though the share of one of the distributees is nominal and unsubstantial. Van Syckel's Estate, 24 Pa. Co. Ct. 241.

Where a wife, by her will, conferred upon her husband the right of disposing of a number of slaves among their children in such manner and proportion as he might think proper, and the husband, by his will, distributed the slaves some to each of the children, but in unequal proportions, it was held that a general power was given, and that the will of the husband was a valid exercise of the same. Cowles v. Brown, 4 Call (Va.) 477.

Where, by a marriage settlement, the wife has the power of appointment to the children of the marriage, and by her will gives a sum, over which the power extends, to her son for life, and after his death as he shall by his will appoint, and, in default of his appointment, to her daughters as tenants in common, the appointment to the son is invalid for remoteness, but the daughters, under the provisions of the will, will take as tenants in common. Wollaston v. King, L. R. 8 Eq. 165, 38 L. J. Ch. N. S. 392, 20 L. T. N. S. 1003, 17 Week. Rep. 641.

c. When donee's will creates a trust.

When the will of the donee of a power of appointment, which creates a trust, will operate as a valid execution of the power, and under what circumstances it will not, appear in the following cases:

Where, by a marriage settlement, a general power of appointment by will, "expressly referring to this power or the subject thereof," was reserved to the husband, his will, giving the residue of his property to trustees on certain trusts differing from those declared by the settlement, in default of appointment, will be deemed a valid exercise of the power. Re Marsh, L. R. 38 Ch. Div. 630, 57 L. J. Ch. N. S. 639, 59 L. T. N. S. 595, 37 Week. Rep. 10.

See Walker v. Banks, 1 Jur. N. S. 606, supra, I. d. 3, and Re Phillips, L. R. 41 Ch. Div. 417, 58 L. J. Ch. N. S. 443, 60 L. T. N. S. 808, 37 Week. Rep. 504, supra, I. e.

By a will property was given to a granddaughter for life, and after her death upon trust for her children, or some of them, or some of their heirs, executors, or administrators, as she should by deed or will appoint. The donee of the power had six children, all of whom were living at the death of the original testator. The donee of the power assumed to exercise it by her will, by which she gave an annuity to one of her daughters, and, subject thereto, bequeathed the trust to her other children in equal shares for life, and, after his or her deaths, as they should respectively by will appoint, with limitations over, in default of appointment, in favor of their respective children. The master of the rolls held that this was a good appointment, saying that he must follow Phipson v. Turner, 9 Blm. 227, 2 Jur. 414, supra, I. b., even if it were wrongly decided, as he could not overrule it at that distance of time; and that, as to the question of remoteness, it did not arise, as all the children of the donee of the power were in existence at the time of its creation. Slark v. Dakyna, L. R. 15 Eq. 307.

Where a testatrix having a general power of appointment of a sum certain, and a special power to appoint the residuum of certain other property by her will professes to give all her real and personal estate whatsoever and wheresoever, of which she has any power to appoint or dispose of, to trustees upon trust to sell, and out of the moneys to pay all her debts, funeral and testamentary expenses; and then proceeds to dispose of the surplus in favor of persons who were the objects of the special power,—it must be supposed that she intended that her own debts should come out of that portion of the property over which she had a general power,—that property which was, in effect, her own,—and the rest to pass to those who were the objects of the special power; and the will must be considered to have been a valid exercise of the complete power of appointment. Ferrier v. Jay, L. R. 10 Eq. 550, 39 L. J. Ch. N. S. 686, 23 L. T. N. S. 302, 18 Week. Rep. 1130.

Where a testator, by his will, invested his wife with the power to provide in her will, in such manner as she chose, for an improvident son; and she, by her will, created a trust for him, evidently because she was not able to put confidence in the receipt by the son of an absolute gift; and a consideration of both wills revealed the fact that the husband had great confidence in his wife's judgment, but that neither he nor she had any confidence in the son's ability to control money if given to him outright, and that his general conduct had been unsatisfactory to both of them,—the creation of such trust for the son was a valid exercise of the general power of appointment as to him, given to the wife by the will of her husband. Kemp v. Kemp, 36 Misc. 79, 72 N. Y. Supp. 617.

While the attempt, in the exercise of a power of appointment, to create a trust which is to accomplish that which is not within the terms of the power, will not be permitted, the fact that a trust is created will not affect the validity of appointment, where such trust really effectuates the intention of the donor by confining the benefits to the selected objects. Bolyes's Estate, 5 W. N. C. 363; Fotterall's Estate, 12 Pa. Co. Ct. 548.

Where a testator, by his will, empowered his wife to divide by will all his real and personal estate among his children as she should think proper, giving to each such a share as her judgment should dictate, and she, by her will, gave and devised the real estate to two of the children, and charged the real estate so devised with legacies to the other children, this was a valid exercise of the power contained in her husband's will. Darling v. Edson, 4 Pa. Super. Ct. 498.

And so where, by the will of a testator, his wife is clothed with the power of appointment to a class; and she, by her will, assumes to create a trust for one of that class,—the will is not invalid as an exercise of the power, but the creation of the trust is; and the member of the class for whom the trust is sought to be created will take an absolute gift. Ibid.

Where a testator, by his will, empowered his wife to devise the estate, both real and personal, to their children, or their proper heirs, as she might deem right and equal in her best judgment, which should be final, a devise in her will of all the real estate she owned at the time of making her will, to her executors to be rented during the minority of the youngest child, and then to be sold by them and converted into money to be invested for the benefit of the children, is not warranted, and is not a good exercise of the power. Doe ex dem. Davis v. Vincent, 1 Houst. (Del.) 416.

A will of a testator gave to his wife all his real and personal estate for life, and otherwise empowered her, by her last will and testament, to give and bequeath all or any part of such estate which might remain at her death to their four children in such shares or proportions as she in her discretion should think fit. A son died leaving a widow, and also a son, to whom, by his last will, he bequeathed and devised all his property. The widow of the original testator bequeathed and devised three fourths of the estate to her other three children in equal proportions, and then attempted to further exercise her power of appointment by bequeathing one-fourth part of her real and personal estate to a trustee to invest and pay one third thereof to her son's widow for her use, and the remaining two thirds for the education and support of her grandson. It was held that, in the exercise of her power of appointment, she was without authority to create the trust diverting a part of the income to her grandson, and that it was an invalid exercise of the power, and that, under the will of the deceased son, the one-fourth portion passed absolutely to his widow. Townsend v. Townsend, 27 Misc. 268, 58 N. Y. Supp. 420.

Where the will of a wife, who was invested with the power of appointment of a sum of money, bequeathed and appointed the same to her husband absolutely, but followed it with a request that, after reserving for his own absolute use and benefit a certain part of that sum, he should make such disposition of the remainder by will, deed, or settlement as he might deem most desirable, to carry out her wishes often expressed to him by word, it was held, although the wife had never by word or otherwise expressed to him any intention or wish as to the disposition of the remainder, yet, as to such remainder, a trust was intended, and, that being the case, the husband was excluded; but, as the will also contained a subsequent bequest to him of, "all and singular, other the testatrix's property," such subsequent bequest was a bequest of the residue of her property, and passed to the husband the property over which he had the power of appointment, notwithstanding her intention to except it from the former appointment in his favor. Bernard v. Minshull, Johns. V. C. (Eng.) 276, 28 L. J. Ch. N. S. 649, 5 Jur. N. S. 931.

Where a testator gave the residue of his estate to his widow for life, and after her death directed that it should pass to and become the estate of such of his children and grandchildren, or either, as his widow by will should appoint, and, in default, should pass to his children and descendants as though he died intestate, the will of the widow creating trusts for life of five ninths of the estate, with remainders over, was, as an exercise of the power of appointment, unwarranted and void. Myers v. Safe Deposit & T. Co. 73 Md. 418, 21 Atl. 58.

d. When power exhausted; revocation.

In several instances the donee of a power of appointment by will or deed has attempted an execution by one or the other instrument, sometimes reserving, and in other instances not, a right to revoke the appointment thus attempted, and has thereafter attempted to revoke the same and reappoint by will. Under what circumstances the power will be held to have been exhausted by the first appointment, or, on the other hand, when the last will be deemed a revocation of the first appointment and valid as a new execution of the power, will be seen by an inspection of the cases in this subdivision.

An intended wife was possessed of two estates, one of which was her own inheritance and the other was derived from her deceased brother. Both were conveyed by agreement, by the settlement, to trustees to hold for such uses as the husband and wife should jointly appoint by a deed, and, in default of appointment, as to one half to pay the rents and proceeds to the husband during the joint lives of himself and his wife, and as to the other half to pay the rents and proceeds to the wife for her separate use during their joint lives, and, upon the death of either, the survivor to take the rents and proceeds for life, subject to these life estates. The estate derived from the brother was limited to such uses as the wife should appoint either by deed or will, and, in default of appointment, it was limited to go to her first and other sons in tail male, with remainder to her daughters as tenants in common in tail general, with cross remainders between them in tail with provisions for default of issue. With a view to correcting an important omission, a deed of appointment exercising that power was duly executed by the husband and wife and the trustees, by which they proceeded to limit and appoint both the estates to such uses as both husband and wife should by deed jointly appoint, and, in default of any such appointment, so far as regarded the estate derived from the brother to such uses as the wife should appoint by deed or will; and, in default of any such appointment, the estate was limited as therein stated as to issue, and, in default of issue, as the wife should by deed or will appoint, and, in default of appointment, to the uses limited by the original settlement. But in this deed of appointment a more serious blunder was made by omitting in the settlement of the estate derived from the brother all the limitations for the lives of the husband and wife and the life of the survivor. Ignorant of this, the wife made her will by which she recited the power contained in the original settlement, and by virtue of that and every other power entitling her to do so, devised all the settled lands. Thereafter the last blunder was discovered, whereupon the husband and wife executed a fresh deed to repair the same between the husband and wife of the one part, and the surviving trustee of the original settlement of the other part. Thereafter the wife died without issue and without having altered or republished her will, or revoked it, unless the last deed operated as a revocation, and it 64 L. R. A.

was held that it did, and that the will was inoperative as an exercise of the power. Walker v. Armstrong, 21 Beav. 284, 25 L. J. Ch. N. S. 402, 2 Jur. N. S. 221, 4 Week. Rep. 280.

In Jowett v. Board, 16 Sim. 352, 18 L. J. Ch. N. S. 53, 12 Jur. N. S. 933, it appeared that a married woman, by virtue of her marriage settlement, had the power of disposing of certain freehold property settled to her separate use, and she exercised that power by a will executed according to the power, and thereby made a specific appointment in the nature of a specific devise, and a disposition of the residue in full execution of the power. After that she purchased a leasehold tenement which was assigned to a trustee virtually for her separate use, giving her a power of appointment. She then, in execution of the leasehold power, made a codicil by which she disposed, in the nature of a specific bequest, of the leasehold. She then purchased the reversion in fee of the leasehold and that reversion was conveyed to a different trustee in fee, in trust for her separate use, with a power of appointment. She then made a second codicil, which in terms referred only to that portion of the specific property which was the subject of the settlement, and it was executed in pursuance of the settlement power, although it purported to be made in pursuance of that power, and of all other powers vested in her, and, in pursuance of the settlement power and of all other powers in her vested, she revoked the testamentary appointment in the nature of a specific bequest which she had made by her will, and made a different disposition of the property; but there was nothing in the last codicil which tended to show that she intended that there should be any other alteration whatever in the effect of her testamentary appointment, save and except that which was confined to the specific object of revoking the first bequest. It was held that the second codicil did not republish the will, and, therefore, that the reversion in fee in the leasehold did not pass by the residuary devise in the will, but the testatrix died intestate as to it.

A tenant for life under a settlement, having the power of appointing the fee by deed or will, exercised the power fully by deed, the instrument containing a power enabling her to revoke, and newly appoint, a power only to be exercised by deed. She afterwards duly executed by deed, as with respect both to revocation and new appointment, to exhaust the power. The latter deed also contained a power enabling her to revoke and newly appoint, a power, however, only exercisable by deed. Thereafter she exercised the power reserved to her by the latter deed so, as with respect to both revocation and new appointment, to exhaust it; the last deed containing a power enabling her to revoke and newly appoint, only exercisable by deed. Thereafter she duly executed and fully revoked the latter deed, or at least the portions of it which consisted of new appointment as distinguished from mere revocation, but did not by such deed newly appoint; and thereafter she made her will, whereby she assumed to exercise the same power of appointment. By the terms of the original settlement, in default of the execution of the power, the fee in remainder after her life estate was settled upon the defendant, who claimed that, if the first deed did not exhaust the power of appointment, the last deed, by its revocation of the same without the making of a new one, did, and there was no power left to appoint by will. The vice chancellor held that this was so, and, accordingly, the appointment by will was bad, and that the estate consequently descended to the defendant in fee. Evans v. Saunders, 1 Drew. 415, 654, 22 L. J. Ch. N. S. 471, 17 Jur. 338, 1 Week. Rep. 220, 529.

This decision was reversed by the high court of chancery, which held that a power which, in any mode or to any extent whatsoever, has been exercised, but exercised revocably, and the revocable appointment made under which has been well revoked without having been acted on, is generally, if not universally, in the same force, and exercisable in the same manner, as if the revoked appointment had not existed, and that a power cannot necessarily be exhausted by a revocable act, though executing otherwise, the power to the utmost, more than by a conditional act or by an act of merely partial execution; and that after the last deed the power was still existing subject to execution, and was executed by the will. Evans v. Saunders, 6 DeG. M. & G. 654.

This decision of the high court of chancery was afterwards unanimously affirmed in 8 H. L. Cas. 721.

A woman, having a power of appointment derived from the will of another, by her will gave the fund over which she had such power, and some specific articles, to trustees in trust for her residuary legatee thereafter named, and then gave her general residue to that person. Thereafter she, by a codicil, revoked the bequest as to the residue, and gave it to that person and another. It was held that the first-named legatee took the fund under the appointment; in other words, that the appointment was exercised by the first gift of the residue. Roach v. Haynes, 6 Ves. Jr. 153, Affirmed in 8 Ves. Jr. 584.

Where a woman had the power of appointment by deed or will by virtue of her marriage settlement, and afterward was, by the will of her father, invested with the power of appointment over an estate thereby given to her for life; and she executed the power over the residuary property given to her by the will of her father by deed in her lifetime, reserving the power of revocation; and thereafter made her will exercising the power of appointment with which she was invested by the marriage settlement, "or otherwise,"—such appointment by the will is not a revocation of the former appointment made by the deed, and the latter is valid. Pomfret v. Perring, 5 DeG. M. & G. 775, 3 Eq. Rep. 145, 24 L. J. Ch. N. S. 187, 1 Jur. N. S. 173, 3 Week. Rep. 81.

A testator, by his will, gave his wife several powers of appointment by deed or will over a certain particular estate, if converted under a trust, for the conversion of the same. The wife executed a deed of appointment in her lifetime in general terms, and afterwards made a will in which she purported to appoint the particular estate so previously appointed by deed, which will made no mention whatever of the previous appointment, and had no recitals or mention of any intention to exercise the power of revocation contained in the deed and to make a new appointment. The court said that her will seemed to have been made with a total forgetfulness or ignorance of the previous appointment, was inconsistent with it, and therefore invalid. Cooper v. Martin, 12 Jur. N. S. 887, 15 L. T. N. S. 268, 15 Week. Rep. 64 L. R. A.

5. Affirmed in L. R. 3 Ch. 47, 17 L. T. N. S. 587, 16 Week. Rep. 234.

Where one having a power of appointment under a marriage settlement executes his will in the express exercise of the power contained in the settlement which was to be exercised by deed or will, and thereafter executes a deed settling the property in a different manner, such deed is sufficient evidence of a contrary intention, within § 24 of the wills act (7 Wm. IV. & 1 Vict. chap. 26), which provides that "every will shall be construed with reference to the real estate and personal estate comprised in it, to speak and take effect as if it had been executed immediately before the death of the testator, unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will;" but, as the deed did not purport to revoke it, the will, under § 19 of the same act, providing that "no will shall be revoked by any presumption of an intention on the ground of an alteration in circumstances," remained in force, and operated as to all that portion of the property which had been imperfectly appointed by the deed. Re Wells, L. R. 42 Ch. Div. 646, 58 L. J. Ch. N. S. 835, 61 L. T. N. S. 588, 38 Week. Rep. 299.

A testator, by his will, gave leaseholds to trustees absolutely on certain trusts, but the trustees were to pay out of the rents an annuity of £60. Subsequent to the date of the will, the testator executed a deed of settlement by which these leaseholds were conveyed absolutely to other trustees. It was held that this was an ademption of the bequest. By the deed of settlement, he reserved to himself the power to carve out of the leaseholds annuities in favor of the persons to whom he had given annuities in his will. He afterwards confirmed the will by a codicil; but it was held that this confirmed it as altered by the ademption of the particular property which was no longer his own, but vested absolutely in trustees on the trust of the deed, and that, under the circumstances, there had been no execution of the power contained in that deed. Cowper v. Mantell, 22 Beav. 228, 2 Jur. N. S. 745, 4 Week. Rep. 500.

Where a woman, with her husband, had the power of appointment under a deed to be executed by will or deed, and she and her husband executed the same by deed, reserving the right to revoke and reappoint during their joint lives by any deed executed by them, and for the survivor of them, by any deed or by will to revoke the uses therein declared, and appoint and declare other uses; and, after the death of her husband, she made a will by which she devised all the real estate to which she would be entitled at her decease, and bequeathed the residue of the personal estate to which she should then be entitled, or over which she might have any disposing power,—such a will is not a valid exercise of the power of revocation and new appointment by virtue of § 27 chap. 26, 7 Wm. IV. & 1 Vict. Re Brace [1891] 2 Ch. 371, 60 L. J. Ch. N. S. 505, 64 L. T. N. S. 525, 39 Week. Rep. 508.

Where one having the power of appointment had exercised it by will, and thereafter, by a codicil, absolutely revoked the appointment, and attempted to make a new one, which latter gift was void by reason of the testator not having the exclusive power of appointment which the codicil assumed to make, the effect is the revocation of the old appointment without making a new one. Quinn v. Butler, L. R. 6 Eq. 225.

c. Appointment by survivor of two or more donees.

A general power of appointment over an equitable estate, given to the survivor of three persons, to be executed by deed or will, is well exercised by a will made during the lives of two of the persons (the third being dead), by the one who afterwards proved to be the survivor. Thomas v. Jones, 1 DeG. J. & S. 63, 1 New Reports, 138, 32 L. J. Ch. N. S. 139, 9 Jur. N. S. 161, 7 L. T. N. S. 610, 11 Week. Rep. 242, Affirming 2 Johns. & H. 475, 31 L. J. Ch. N. S. 782, 8 Jur. N. S. 1124, 7 L. T. N. S. 154, 10 Week. Rep. 853. In this case the chancellor said that it was a general power that might be used for the benefit of the person entitled to exercise it. That it was, therefore, equivalent to ownership; in fact it was a right of exercising ownership, that would certainly belong to one of the three designated, but was uncertain as to the individual in whom it might become vested. And that to assert that the right to exercise such a power, until the person of the donee be ascertained, was simply to beg the question at issue, and to affirm a conclusion, with regard to a contingent right to a power, which is wholly untrue with respect to a contingent right to an equitable estate.

But where a power was contained in a marriage settlement, whereby the trust fund was limited in trust for such of the children of the marriage as the husband and wife should jointly appoint, or, in default of such appointment, then as the survivor at any time or times "after the decease of the other" should by deed or will appoint; and the husband, during his wife's lifetime, made a will referring to the power, and binding the fund in favor of some of the children, and survived the wife,—it was held that this was not a valid exercise of the power of appointment. Cave v. Cave, 8 DeG. M. & G. 131, 2 Jur. N. S. 295.

f. Appointment by infant.

Where by the terms of a marriage settlement it was provided that under certain circumstances, the intended wife, who was described therein and who was then an infant, should have a power of appointment; and she thereafter, while still a minor, exercised the power,—such appointment was valid. Re D'Angibau, L. R. 15 Ch. Div. 228, 49 L. J. Ch. N. S. 756, 43 L. T. N. S. 135, 28 Week. Rep. 930.

A testator conveyed to trustees for his daughter, a married woman, who was an infant, his real and personal estate and the income thereof for life, with the general power by her deed or writing to give and dispose of the same notwithstanding her coverture; and she afterwards, during her infancy and coverture, assumed to exercise the power by providing for an annuity for her infant daughter, and bequeathing her a sum certain, to be paid to her when she was twenty-one, and providing for its disposition if she died before the age of twenty-one without issue, and devising the residue of her real and personal estate. It was held that her will was a valid execution of the power as to the personality, but not as to the realty, that as to the personality, being above the age of seventeen, she might, if sole, make a will, and the will of her father which created the power directed that she should have the same free from her coverture,—it was the same as if she were sole; but, as to the real estate, the chancellor said that it was a considerable question, and never determined that he knew of, that he could find no case where a power given generally could be executed by an infant; and that he would make none; that from the penning of this power there was a strong objection against her executing it during infancy, for her father, having the coverture in view, had excluded that, giving her power to dispose notwithstanding that; and that he would also have excluded the case of infancy had he so intended; and that then the rule was, Expressio unius exclustio alterius; that he might not think there was any occasion for giving her power during infancy, as she was then about nineteen; his plain view being to secure it free from the husband's power, and that he might not induce or cajole her to part with it. Secondly, that this was a power coupled with interest, for she had the trust in equity for life, with the trust of the inheritance in her in the meantime, which would remain in herself if not disposed of, and descend to her daughter; so that this was directly a power over her own inheritance which cannot be executed by an infant. Hearle v. Greenbank, 3 Atk. 695, 1 Ves. Sr. 305.

g. Exercised at different times and by different acts; partial appointment

The following cases show that a power of appointment need not necessarily be exercised completely at one time and by a single act; and also that a partial execution is valid to its extent:

A general power of appointment may be executed at different times and by different acts; and, where certain property was settled by a deed executed by a husband to a trustee, whereby he, in consideration of considerable property brought to him by his wife, settled the property upon the trustee to her use during life, with power, to the use of such persons as she by her last will or testament, or other deed in writing, should appoint; and thereafter there was a partial execution of the power by the deed of the husband and wife and trustee,—a subsequent execution of it by the wife in her last will, which does not make the same provision for her husband as that contained in the deed executed by him and her and the trustee, will be void so far as it is in conflict with that deed, where the excess can be clearly ascertained, and her will, by virtue of the power of appointment, passed that portion of the personal property which had not been previously disposed of; but the life estate given to the husband by that deed was a valid execution of the power of appointment to that extent, and was a previous disposition of the personal property embraced by it, which could not be revoked or taken away by the subsequent will. Johnson v. Yates, 9 Dana, 491.

Where a testator had bequeathed to his widow personal property, with power to dispose of the same by will or otherwise, and also devised to her a house and lot for life, her will disposing of the personal property, and devising the house and lot, is a valid appointment of the personal property, and her will should, to that extent, be admitted to probate; but, as she had no power, under the will, to dispose of the house and lot, the probate of her will assuming to do so should be refused. Ford v. Ford, 2 Duv. 418.

A power reserved by a married woman in a marriage settlement to appoint by her last will and testament, notwithstanding her coverture, copyhold lands and rent charge, and also all other property, real or personal, which she had, or which might descend or come to her during coverture, is legally exercised by the devise of a moiety of such copyhold lands and rent charge. Wright v. Englefield, 1 Amb. 468, 2 Eden, 239, Affirmed in 1 Bro. P. C. 486.

Where a woman possessing the power to appoint by her will in favor of a class of persons, and, if one of the class should die without issue, then to the survivors, made her will reciting correctly the authority given her to appoint, appointing the whole estate to the six permitted devisees, but in unequal proportions, and providing, if one should die without issue, his share should go to the other five, thereby completely and perfectly executing the authorized appointment in all respects within the limits of the power; and thereafter the one thus mentioned died, and she made her codicil endeavoring to give his share a new direction, and send it to persons not authorized in the creation of the power,—there was no question that such a direction was outside the power, and not a good exercise of it, and the question in the case was whether the whole appointment was void, and the equal division of the original testator operated, or the unauthorized appointment was simply a nullity, and left the valid appointment of the will undisturbed. It was held that the will made a good appointment, and was a valid exercise of the power, and that it could not be said, in regard to all the circumstances, that the codicil operated as a revocation of the devise over, as it was itself null and void. Austin v. Oakes, 117 N. Y. 577, 23 N. E. 193.

Where the donee of a power of appointment to children assumes to exercise the same by in part disposing of the property under the appointment to grandchildren, and the question of fraud is not in the case, the appointment, so far as it is exercised in favor of the children, is valid, and the appointment to the grandchildren is void. Cruise v. McKee, 2 Head, 1, 73 Am. Dec. 186.

Where a husband, by the will of his wife, had a life estate in her property, with the power of appointment to dispose of it as he should think best between their three children, two of whom died, one leaving a child; and the husband, by his will, disposed of the whole of the property left by his wife to the surviving child, charging it with the payment of a certain sum to the grandchild,—the will was a good power of appointment, but the charge in favor of the grandchild was void. Herrick v. Fowler, 108 Tenn. 410, 67 S. W. 861. In this case the same rule was laid down in regard to a power in a deed from another person to the husband as donee, the conditions of which were the same as those of the will of the wife.

Where a man, by his will, gave a certain sum to be disposed of by his wife to and amongst his three daughters in such proportions, etc., as she should think fit, either by will or other writing, or any other disposition; and the mother, on the marriage of one daughter, by verbal agreement gave her her share, and, in further pursuance of her power, gave her an additional sum, and then gave another daughter, who was dead and to whom she was executrix, her share of the principal sum, and declared that, as the third daughter had behaved undutifully, she would have only what remained, and died leaving her son sole executor and residuary legatee,—it was held that it was a good appointment of the gift to the first daughter, also of the additional sum, and also of the sum bequeathed to the last one, but that the appointment to the deceased daughter was void, as it could only vest in her executrix, who was the person exercising the power. Madison v. Andrew, 1 Ves. Sr. 61.

Where the donee of a power of appointment among her children, by her last will and testament assumed to appoint it to a son for life, and thereafter to his children as he should appoint, and in default of his appointment, to a daughter absolutely; and, after giving certain legacies appointed, devised, and bequeathed all her real and personal estate, not specifically and absolutely appointed or bequeathed, to the same daughter absolutely—it was conceded that the appointment to the son, by reason of its being charged with his appointment to his children, was invalid; but the appointment to the daughter was held to be a valid exercise of the power. Wallinger v. Wallinger, L. R. 9 Eq. 301, 22 L. T. N. S. 259, 18 Week. Rep. 274.

While a bequest in the will of one possessing a power of appointment limited to the children of the donee of the power, to a son-in-law of such donee, is not a valid exercise of the power, other bequests in the same will to the children of the donee are a good exercise of the appointment. Ratcliffe v. Hampson, 1 Jur. N. S. 1104, 4 Week. Rep. 67.

Where a testatrix, who, by the will of her father, had been invested with the power to appoint a fund, by deed or will, amongst her brothers and sisters; and she by her will, after directing her debts and funeral and testamentary expenses to be paid out of her personal estate, gave legacies to persons not objects of the power, and a portion of the fund which was the subject of the power to persons who were objects of it; and then bequeathed the residue of her personal estate, after payment of her debts, funeral, and testamentary expenses and the legacies before mentioned, to two persons, who, also, were objects of the power,—this residuary clause was a valid appointment of the remainder of the fund which was the subject of the power. Elliott v. Elliott, 15 Sim. 321, 15 L. J. Ch. N. S. 393, 10 Jur. 730.

Where, in an attempted exercise of the power of appointment by will, it is obvious that, as to some of the objects, the appointment is in excess of the power, although others may be within it, if the court cannot possibly define the class which fall within the power and those which must be without it, the whole gift will fail. Re Brown, 1 Kay & J. 522, 3 Week. Rep. 542, L. R. 1 Eq. 74.

A married woman being possessed of savings of her separate estate to a considerable amount, and having the power of appointment in regard to a still larger amount, made her will directing the payment of her debts and funeral and testamentary expenses, and then gave, bequeathed, limited, and appointed, in pursuance of all powers and authorities in any wise enabling her in that behalf, all her clothes, and all her ready money, and money which might be due to her at her decease, and all other articles of personalty belonging to her, but not including property she had no power to dispose of, to a servant. There was no express residuary gift, and no further reference to the power. Prior to the date of her will, and down to her death, she lived apart from her husband. Her executor paid her debts out of the sum which were the savings of her separate estate, and, in an action between the party entitled as her next of kin under the settlement in default of appointment and the executor of her will, it was held that the legatee was entitled to have her legacy without any deduction for debts; and that, as the debts had been paid out of the "ready money," the amount must be made good out of the settled fund; but that the remainder of that fund must then be divided according to the trust of the settlement as in default of appointment. Laing v. Cowan, 24 Beav. 112.

Where one having a power of appointment by will, by his will makes certain gifts which are valid, and others which are invalid as offending the law against perpetuities, the will, as to the former, is a good exercise of the power of appointing, but not as to the latter. Albert v. Albert, 68 Md. 352, 12 Atl. 11; Graham v. Whitridge (Md.) 57 Atl. 609.

h. Exercise by deed of power limited to will.

Where the donor of a power of appointment directs that the same be exercised by a will, it cannot be executed by a deed, and conversely, where in its creation it is stipulated that the power is to be executed by deed, an attempt to exercise it by will will be ineffectual.

A conveyance to a person during his natural life, and, after his death, to such person as he, by any writing in hand of his last will and testament signed and sealed by him, and executed in the presence of three credible witnesses, might limit and appoint; and, in default of such appointment, to such child or children as he might leave to be divided equally among them, creates a power of appointment which can only be executed by will; and an attempt to execute it by deed will be ineffectual. Bentham v. Smith, Cheves, Eq. 33, 34 Am. Dec. 599.

Where a testator, by his will, gave, devised, and bequeathed to a daughter the residuum of his estate, both real and personal, during the term of her natural life, and, after her decease, to her children, with liberty to devise the same at her discretion, such a power of appointment is not and cannot be exercised by deed, as the power is given to devise, and not to sell and convey by deed, and must be executed in the mode prescribed by the instrument which confers it, and, if not so executed, it passes nothing. Moore v. Dimond, 5 B. I. 121.

A power which gives the donee at her decease the right to make a distribution and disposal of the remaining property among the children of the donor as may seem just and equitable, according to her discretion, can only be exercised by a will, and cannot be exercised in the lifetime of the donee of the power by deed. Freeland v. Pearson, L. R. 3 Eq. 658, 36 L. J. Ch. N. S. 374, 15 Week. Rep. 419.

Where a testator devised real property to trustees to hold in trust for his grandson to receive the rents and profits, with the power to dispose of it by will at his death; and the donee of the power, and the trustees, and the widow of the testator united in a deed to another; and thereafter the donee, by his will, 64 L. R. A.

disposed of the same land,—this was held to be an exercise of the power which no act other than the testamentary disposition of it by the donee could prevent; and that his testamentary disposition conveyed the real title, in despite of the before-mentioned deed. Bolton v. DePeyster, 25 Barb. 539; Learned v. Tallmadge, 26 Barb. 444.

Where a married woman is invested with a power of appointment by her will, if such conveyance is made during the life of her husband, an action cannot be maintained by her and her husband on a contract to convey such real property, against the other party to the contract, for the purchase money, for the reason that they cannot give a good title; as, during the life of her husband she could not exercise the power by a deed. And she could not exercise it by a will, and a covenant not to revoke the latter, as a will made in execution of a power, while not strictly a will, but simply a declaration of a use, yet so far retains the properties of a will as to be ambulatory until the death of the testator, and, consequently, revocable in the same manner as an ordinary testamentary instrument. Reid v. Boushall, 107 N. C. 345, 12 S. E. 324.

A power of appointment to be exercised by a last will cannot be executed by an instrument which is to take effect during the lifetime of the donee of the power, as the intention of the donor is that the donee shall have his whole lifetime to determine in what manner the power shall be exercised. Taliaferro v. Young Men's Christian Asso. 10 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 1.

A testator, by his will, devised the use and benefits and bequeathed all of his real estate to his wife for life, and all his personal property absolutely, "having full confidence that she will leave the surplus to be divided, at her decease, justly among my children." The word "leave" being inapplicable to a deed, the power must be executed by will, and cannot be executed by an act to take effect in the donee's lifetime. McKonkey's Appeal, 13 Pa. 259.

The will of a testator, after devising and bequeathing to his infant daughter all of his property to be her sole and separate estate, and free from the contracts and obligations of any person with whom she might intermarry, during her coverture, as though she had remained sole, provided, further, that, in the event of the death of his daughter without lawful issue, the property so devised and bequeathed should go as she might, by any instrument in the nature of a last will under hand and seal, direct; and, the power to dispose of the same in the event of her death without issue, either before or after the age of twenty-one years, and either while single or covert, was thereby given her, to be exercised and executed in the manner just described, and in no other way. The daughter married, and thereafter she and her husband entered into a contract with another for the sale of a large tract of real estate devised by the will of her father. Upon a bill filed for the specific performance of the contract, it was held that the bill must be dismissed as the complainants could not give good title to the property, which, under the will of the father of the wife, could only be disposed of by will under the power therein contained, i. e., by her will; and she could not dispose of the property by deed, gift, or sale. Starnes v. Allison, 2 Head, 221.

Where a testator, in his will, devised to his wife his estate during her widowhood, with the power to dispose of the same by her last will and testament, she could not, in her lifetime, convey any portion of such estate by deed; and, where she assumed to do so, and thereafter devised the whole of the lands by will, it was held that the parties taking under the will could successfully maintain ejectment against one claiming under a deed made by her in her lifetime. Gaskins v. Finks, 90 Va. 384, 19 S. E. 166.

A testator, by his will, gave to his wife all his property, both real and personal, during her life. His will then contained this further provision: "I further will and request that at her death she makes such disposition of it as she may think best." She afterwards intermarried with another, who, after making his will, died leaving her surviving. After the death of her second husband, she, by an instrument under seal, in which she referred to the power of appointment in the will of her first husband, conveyed to certain parties all the land and negroes and property of every kind, of which her first husband became possessed by virtue of his marriage with her, and which she claimed the power to dispose of by virtue of his will before mentioned. Afterwards she executed her last will, by which she devised and bequeathed the same property to her executors in trust for her grandson, and shortly thereafter died. It was held that the will of her first husband created a power in her to dispose of all his property; that the execution of the instrument mentioned, in her lifetime, was not a good execution of the power, as, if it was a deed, it was not good as an execution of the power, which could be executed by will alone, and that, if it was a will, it was subject to be superseded by the subsequent repugnant will. This action was an action of trover, brought by the executor of her will to recover certain slaves; and it was further held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover. Porter v. Thomas, 23 Ga. 467.

On the other hand, where a deed of trust provides that the same shall be held by the trustees for such estates and in such manner as one named therein shall appoint by deed, and, in default of appointment by deed, to the settler's three children, the power of appointment must be executed by deed, and cannot be executed by the will of the donee of the power. Shore v. Shore, 21 Ont. Rep. 54.

Where a power is created with the condition that it be executed by deed, it cannot be executed by will. Darlington v. Pulteney, 1 Cowp. 260.

But in Sneed v. Sneed, 1 Ambl. 64, it was held that where a power to charge lands provided that it should be by deed or deeds duly executed, a will making the charge is a valid exercise of the power.

1. Gift of less estate than provided in power.

Where an appointment is to be made of a particular estate, or in a certain manner, and in no other way, the negative words must control, and the donee is not permitted to appoint a different estate, or in any other manner; but where the party has the power to appoint a fee, if there are no words of positive restriction, a less estate may be appointed. The appointment of a less estate than the donee might have created under the power is not 64 L. R. A.

hereby rendered void; and so, where the husband had conveyed the property in trust for the use and benefit of his wife during her natural life, and upon her death the trustee was to convey the real estate, or so much thereof as should remain undisposed of, to such person or persons as she by her last will and testament should have directed and appointed, the court held that it was expressly declared that, upon the decease of the donee of the power, the real estate should belong, in fee absolute, to such person or persons as she should have appointed by her will. By her will she gave and bequeathed to another the property involved in the action, with the use, possession, rents, and profits during her natural life, "the reversion and fee thereof to the heirs of her body at and after her decease." It was held that, although the power of appointment extended to a disposition of the whole property in fee absolute, yet the will, by the use of the terms "during her natural life" and "heirs of her body," conveyed to the appointee only a life estate, and the fee reverted to the creator of the power. Butler v. Huestis, 68 Ill. 594, 18 Am. Rep. 589.

1. Delegation of exercise of power.

A power of appointment, where trust and confidence are reposed in the donee, is personal to the donee, and cannot be delegated. Hood v. Haden, 82 Va. 588.

In Crooke v. Kings County, 97 N. Y. 421, it was held, by a divided court, that an absolute testamentary power of disposition, given to a wife, could be delegated by her to her husband, and an exercise thereof by him would be upheld. Earl, J., in delivering one of the prevailing opinions, said, after discussing various English decisions holding to the same effect: "I therefore reach the conclusion that there are abundant authority and reason for holding that the execution of the absolute testamentary power of disposition, given to Mrs. Crooke, could be delegated to her husband; and I am confident that there is not a dictum, or even a hint, to be found in any textbook or judicial opinion, to the contrary, and to me it is inconceivable how there could be any."

But all of the opinions admitted the correctness of the principle laid down in Hood v. Haden.

k. Exercise for consideration.

The donee of a power of appointment cannot exercise the same for a consideration passing to him, or in any way for his own benefit. Taliaferro v. Young Men's Christian Asso. 10 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 1.

Where a wife, by virtue of a provision in the will of her husband, was clothed with the power of appointment among their children at her death, and she, in order to relieve herself from a liability to a son which he was about to enforce by suit, agreed so to exercise the power as to give him a double share, and, in pursuance of that agreement, by her will did give him a double share, such an attempted exercise of the power of appointment will not be sustained. If a parent has a power of appointment to such of her children as she may choose, she cannot appoint it to one of the children upon a bargain beforehand for her own benefit. Holt v. Hogan, 58 N. C. (5 Jones, Eq.) 82.

Where, by a settlement, certain bank annuities and stock, the property of the husband.

were vested in trustees upon trust, after the death of the survivor, as to one equal moiety thereof for all and every the children or child of the marriage as the husband and wife should, during their joint lives, appoint, or, in default of such appointment, as the survivor of them should by deed or will appoint; and the husband survived, and by his will devised and bequeathed all other real and personal estate and effects, whatsoever and wheresoever, of or to which he might be at the time of his death seised or entitled, or over which he might have "any beneficial power of disposition,"—it was held that the words "property over which I may have any beneficial power of disposition" excluded the property comprised in the settlement, and he could not, under the power of disposition given to him by the settlement, derive any benefit; and that the word "beneficially," as used by the testator, described a power from the exercise of which he or his estate could derive a benefit; and that it was only by so reading the word that the whole will could be made consistent with itself. Ames v. Cadogan, L. R. 12 Ch. Div. 868, 48 L. J. Ch. N. S. 762, 41 L. T. N. S. 211, 27 Week. Rep. 905.

A testator, by his will, gave to his son a life interest in a share of his residuary estate, with power, by deed or will, to be executed in the presence of one or more witness or witnesses, to appoint such share to his son or daughter, or sons or daughters, in such shares and proportions as he saw fit. By the issue of his first marriage the son had two children, a son, the petitioner herein, and a daughter, the respondent. Their mother having died, he afterwards remarried, but there was no issue of the second marriage. Thereafter he made his will in the French language, but executed it according to English law, by which, after reciting the power of appointment given him by his father's will he, by virtue of, and in exercise of, that power, appointed that the share in which he took a life interest under that will should, after his death, go to his daughter absolutely, and, in case she should die in his lifetime, to his son absolutely. Thereafter the daughter married, and a settlement was made by a French instrument, not under seal, to which she, her intended husband, and her father were all parties, in which he assumed, by virtue of his right to appoint under his father's will, to settle 60,000 francs on his daughter, the intended wife, reserving to himself the faculty of disposing of the securities and claims, in favor of his second wife, of the reversion of 10,000 francs during her life. Thereafter, being a resident of France, he made a codicil to his will, entirely in his own handwriting, but unattested, in which he stated that the reservation in favor of his second wife, in the settlement before mentioned, had been consented to by the daughter and her husband, and he did not doubt they would execute their engagement; but that, in case they should not respect it, he gave one half of the whole sum or share of his father's estate to his son, but, if they did so respect it, then the daughter and her husband should have the whole sum of his share according to the original will. This codicil was, together with his will, admitted to probate under the act 24 & 25 Vict. chap. 114, which provides that wills of personal estate, made out of the United Kingdom, by British subjects, shall be held to be well executed for the purpose of being admitted to probate, if made according to the forms required by the place where the same are made. It was held, first, that the codicil was a void appointment in equity, supposing it to be otherwise a good appointment, as equity would not allow it to stand because it proceeded upon a bargain which was contrary to the nature of the power; second, that the same may be said of the appointment made by the settlement of the daughter's marriage. Re Kirwan, L. R. 25 Ch. Div. 373, 52 L. J. Ch. N. S. 952, 49 L. T. N. S. 202, 32 Week. Rep. 581.

1. Exercise for charitable use.

Where a power of appointment is, by its terms, to be executed by any writing under the hand and seal of the donee, etc., in the nature of a last will and testament; and the donee assumes to execute it in all respects conforming to the requirements, except that it is not under seal,—the execution of the power, though for ordinary purposes void, yet if for a charitable use, will be sustained as a good appointment, Pepper's Will, 1 Pars. Sel. Eq. Cas. 436.

In Atty. Gen. v. Sawtell, 2 Atk. 497, the question was whether copyhold lands surrendered by a testator to the use of his will, and devised by him in charity, would pass, as the testator had not signed the last sheet, nor were there any witnesses to it; and the chancellor held that though the will was not signed on the last sheet, and was without witnesses, it was a good appointment of the copyhold estate for the charity, according to the statute of 43 Eliz. chap. 4.

III. Relief in equity against defective exercise of power.

A married woman, entitled under the will of her father to an undivided moiety of certain freehold and leasehold properties, with her husband conveyed the freehold to another in fee, and assigned to him her moiety of the leasehold by way of mortgage for securing the sum advanced by him to her husband, reserving to herself, subject to such mortgage, the power of the appointment of the equity of redemption; and, her husband having died, she thereafter wrote and signed an unattested paper, by which, after referring to the property in terms sufficient to identify it, she said that, if she died suddenly, she wished her eldest son to have it, and that her intention was to make it over to him legally if her life was spared. Shortly thereafter she was taken ill, and died without making any other disposition of her property by will or otherwise. It was held that, although this was a defective execution of the power of appointment, yet it was such a case that equity would relieve against it in favor of her eldest son. Kennard v. Kennard, L. R. 8 Ch. 227, 42 L. J. Ch. N. S. 280, 28 L. T. N. S. 83, 21 Week. Rep. 206.

Where a settlement creating a power of appointment provides that it shall be executed by a will duly executed, and the donee assumes to execute the same by a will in the presence of only two witnesses, the law requiring three, it is a defective execution of the power; but it is one that may be supplied, as, where a will is to operate by way of appointment, it takes no effect from the statute, though the rules prescribed by the statute may, as in this case, be arbitrarily inserted by the party; and the appointee cannot claim under the will, but by the deed of settlement directing the execution of the power, which, together with the instrument executing the power, makes in effect but one thing, doing the thing for the purpose of which the power was created. Wilkes v. Holmes, 9 Mod. 485.

Where a husband, having the power, by virtue of a settlement, to make a jointure on his wife by deed, made his will whereby he devised part of his lands within his power to his wife for life, it was objected that the conveyance, being by will, was not warranted by the power, which directed that it should be by deed, and that a will is a voluntary conveyance, and not to be aided in a court of equity. It appeared that the husband had made no provision for his wife other than that contained in his will, and the master of the rolls said that this was a provision for a wife who had none before, and, within the same reason, was a provision for a child not before provided for; and, as a court of equity would, had this been the case of a copyhold devise, have supplied the want of a surrender, so, where there is a defective execution of the power by it, either for payment of debts, or provision for a wife or children unprovided for, he would equally supply any defect of this nature. A defective execution of a power will always be aided in equity under such circumstances, it being the duty of every man to pay his debts, and of a husband or father to provide for his wife or child. Tollet v. Tollet, 2 P. Wms. 489.

But a court of equity will not help the non-execution of a power, since it is against the nature of a power, which is left to the free will and election of the party whether to execute it or not; for which reason equity will not say he shall execute it, or do that for him which he does not think fit to do himself. Ibid.

In Taylor v. Rains, 7 Mod. 148, a woman, before her marriage, had articles of settlement with her intended husband, to the effect that such person should have the profits of a term under a lease held by her as she should by her last will appoint, and, the day before her marriage, made a will devising the trust of the term to another, and then married. After her death the executor appointed in the will attempted to prove it in the spiritual court, and, on a motion by the husband in the King's bench for a prohibition, it was held that the court below had no jurisdiction of the same as a will, but that it amounted to an appointment in equity, who should have the trust according to the articles; and that the appointee was entitled to administration.

A testatrix, by her holographic will, bequeathed one third of her estate, real and personal, to her son for life, at his death a sum certain to his first daughter, naming her, "the balance of his portion of my estate at his own entire disposal." The estate consisted wholly of personal property, which had always been, and was, at the donor's domicile. The daughter of the son who was the legatee under her grandmother's will, died before the latter. The son, being domiciled in another state, executed his holographic will, which, by reason of its being such, was valid, and was admitted to probate in the state in which he was domiciled, in which he stated that, in the exercise of the power of appointment, conferred upon him by the last will and testament of his late mother, over that portion of her estate devised and bequeathed to him for life, he appointed and gave to his wife, for her absolute use, the whole of the property, both real and personal, given 64 L. R. A.

him by the will of his mother for life with the power of appointment as stated. It was held that, even if the will of the son was not effective as a will in the execution of a power, because not executed in the presence of witnesses, according to the laws of the state of the domicile of the donor of the power, and in which the property was, equity ought to intervene with its remedial powers to carry out the son's purpose and intention to give his wife his portion of the estate; and it was held to be a valid appointment. Ward v. Stanard, 82 App. Div. 386, 81 N. Y. Supp. 906.

Where a wife had a general power of appointment by her last will and testament in writing, or appointment in nature of a will, to be by her signed and published in the presence of, and attested by, two or more credible witnesses; and her will, claiming to exercise the power, was signed by her and attested thus: "Witness," followed by the names of two witnesses,—the case, upon the question as to whether, when a power is given to be executed by such a will as was named in the settlement, a will like this is a good execution of the power, was sent to the court of common pleas for decision, but the other question in the case, i. e., whether a husband is entitled to have a defective execution of a power in his favor, by his wife, supplied, was decided by the vice chancellor in the negative. Moodie v. Reid, 2 Madd. 156, 16 Revised Rep. 257.

By a marriage settlement of husband and wife certain funds were vested in trustees, for their benefit for their lives, and afterwards, in trust for the children, grandchildren, or other issue of the marriage, to be born before any appointment, as the husband and wife, or the survivor, should appoint, and, for want of such appointment, upon trust for all the children of the marriage equally. The settlement contained a clause by which "no child" taking any part under an appointment should share in the unappointed part, unless he should bring the sum appointed to him into hotchpot "with the other children" of the marriage. This hotchpot clause was, therefore, applicable only as between the children. There were two children of the marriage,—sons. The wife died, and thereafter one of the sons died leaving a son. The husband thereafter, in his lifetime, appointed part of the fund to his surviving son, and thereafter died having made his will, by which he gave to the same son some policies and all other property which he might have at his death. He then proceeded as follows: "He will have to bring into hotchpot that portion of the fund settled on the marriage of his dear mother, which has already been received by him, and then, as I make no further appointment under the power for that purpose, the whole settled fund will be equally divided between him and my little grandson,"—meaning the plaintiff in the action. The husband possessing the power of appointment, the master of the rolls, after referring to the circumstance that he had appointed a portion of the sum to his surviving son, referred to that circumstance, and said: "I make no further appointment;" and that it could not be contended that this was an appointment. That although it might be said that, if he had understood what the effect would be, he would have made an appointment, yet that admits that there was no appointment. And he held that the remaining fund must, therefore, go as in default of the appointment. Langslow v. Langslow, 21 Beav. 552, 25 L. J. Ch. N. S. 610, 2 Jur. N. S. 1057.

IV. When power in effect absolute gift.

Where a testator, by his will, gave to his wife, if she survived him, power to appoint a leasehold estate in the same manner as she should direct with respect to the disposition of her residuary personal estate; and she, by her will, gave the same to one for life, and thereafter, by a residuary clause, disposed of all the residuum of her personal estate, subject to the payment of some legacies,—this was held to be a valid exercise of the power. The master of the rolls said that it was the same as if the testator had said: "On the death of my wife, I give it to the particular persons who shall select and appoint;" but that he had or as if he had said: "I give it to such of the residuary legatees named in her will as she shall select and appoint;" but that he had done no such thing; he had not mentioned any person at all, nor even designated a class of persons; he had done nothing more than to say that the estate would go "to the same uses, upon the same trusts, and to and for the same intents and purposes as my wife may have declared, or shall hereafter declare, with respect to the disposition of her residuary personal estate;"—that is to say, he did not point out any person at all; it is nothing more than this,—"It shall form part of my wife's residuary personal estate." That his intention was, and the object and purpose of the will were, to do nothing more than to make this estate pass as part of the residuary personal estate, and, being so, it passed by her will. Bristow v. Skirrow, 5 Jur. N. S. 1379, 1 L. T. N. S. 180.

Where a testator gave to his wife the residue of his personal property to and for her own use and benefit, and to be at her own absolute disposal, and, if not disposed of, it should go to two nephews and a niece; and the widow made her will, in which there was no reference or allusion to her husband's will; and she thereby disposed of all her personal estate to other persons than the two nephews and niece named in her husband's will; and a sum of stock, which was part of the husband's property, given to the wife, remained in his name at the widow's death.—It was held that the widow took an absolute interest in the whole of the testator's residuary estate, and that the stock in question passed by the will. Bourn v. Gibbs, 1 Russ. & M. 614, Tamlyn, 414, 8 L. J. Ch. 151.

Where a partnership deed provided that the interest of one of the partners in the concern should, after his death and during the term of the partnership, go to such person as he should, by will, name and appoint, and he made a will, not alluding to the power, but by which he gave all his estate and effects to one of his children, his interest in the partnership passed by the will; but in this case it was really held that the expression "name and appoint," in the partnership deed, was but saying that the agreement was that the partnership should be continued during its term, to whoever became lawfully possessed of his interest therein after his death, which was the reason why it passed under the description in his will of "all other his estate and effects, of whatsoever name and description." Ponton v. Dunn, 1 Russ. & M. 402.

A provision in a will giving stock to a married woman for her separate use, and, whenever she should die, to be absolutely in her own power to dispose of by will, or writing purporting to be a will, to any person or persons, purpose or purposes, as she should think proper; but in case of her failure of any such disposition or appointment, to go over,—is not a power, but an absolute gift, qualified only as to her situation as a married woman, and to prevent the husband from taking as administrator in case of her death; and the stock passed by general words in her will. Hales v. Margerum, 3 Ves. Jr. 290. In this case the master of the rolls said: "If the interests of married women are criticized, as this has been, I do not know how property could be given to a married woman; it would be all power. When this administratrix gives all her stock and all her real estate, she does mean to include this sum. It must be included under the word 'my,' being an absolute interest in her. I do not now want the authority of Standen v. Standen [2 Ves. Jr. 589, supra, I. d. 1]; though I do not quarrel with it."

V. Miscellaneous cases.

Where a power of appointment, claimed to exist upon a settlement, does so by implication merely, a will particularly executing express powers will not be deemed a valid exercise of the power thus implied. Atty. Gen. v. Vigor, 8 Ves. Jr. 256.

Where a person having a power of appointment by will disposed by will, of certain shares of the sum of which she has the power to dispose, to two children, who died during her lifetime, and she made no change in her will, the shares thus appointed lapse, and as to such portions the power is not to be considered as having been exercised. Marlborough v. Godolphin, 2 Ves. Sr. 61.

Where a husband, upon a treaty of marriage, covenanted with the wife's relation, in consideration of a certain sum, to execute his power, and settle a sum per year upon the wife for her jointure; and afterwards, in pursuance of such covenant, by deed reciting his power and the covenant and declaring that he was minded to execute his power, limited several farms, at the rents at which they were then let, to the value of about the sum per year settled upon the wife, and in the deed the rental of each particular farm was expressed, and, after the marriage took effect, it was found that when the leases of the farms expired the lands would not let again for the same rent, but sank in their rental value; and the husband thereafter made a will, and, by a codicil thereto, desired and earnestly requested his son, inasmuch as the lands settled on his mother were greatly fallen in value, to make up his mother's jointure to the amount originally covenanted by the testator,—it was held that the request in the codicil was a completion of the imperfect execution of the power as to the jointure. Vernon v. Vernon, 1 Amb. 3.

Where a deed of settlement was executed in contemplation of an intended marriage; and contained a recital that the intended wife was entitled to a share in certain profits from coal mines during the continuance of a license under certain leases; and also a provision that the same should be held by the trustees to such trusts and purposes as she should at any time after the expiration of six years, or such early period as certain mortgages of the leasehold houses should have been discharged, by deed duly executed, or by will from time to time, or at any time, appoint,—the provision “after the expiration of six years” does not apply to the will; and the will of the wife, made immediately after her marriage, was a proper and complete exercise of the power contained in the settlement; and the property therein mentioned would go according to the dispositions of the will. Re Hernando, L. R. 27 Ch. Div. 284, 53 L. J. Ch. N. S. 865, 51 L. T. N. S. 117, 33 Week. Rep. 252.

The will of a woman having the power of appointment of a sum certain to any of her kin, and, for want of appointment, to go according to the statute, which appointed the same to her nephew upon the condition that he pay his mother an annuity, and then bequeathed to another of her kin all the rest and residue of that of which she had power to dispose, is a valid exercise of the power; and, the nephew, to whom the conditional appointment was made, having died before the donee of the power, the appointment was, as to him, void, but was a valid exercise of the power so far as the annuitant was concerned; and the remainder will pass under the residuary bequest. Oke v. Heath, 1 Ves. Sr. 135.

By a marriage settlement, a term of years was created to raise and pay to younger children such sums as the father should think fit, and as he by deed or will should appoint, and subject to, and chargeable with, the same upon trust to attend the inheritance. The father, who was tenant for life, and the eldest son of the man who was tenant in tail, suffered a recovery to the use of the father in fee, but the recovery did not destroy the term. The father and son made a mortgage in fee, and the father covenanted not to make any appointment of portions to overreach the mortgage. By his will he devised the estates to trustees, to sell and pay the encumbrances and his debts, and out of the remainder of the money to pay his second son a certain sum, and his two daughters each a certain sum. The lord chancellor held that this was not an execution of the power. Tempest v. Sabine, Sugden, Powers, Appx. No. 10.

A power to appoint by will is well executed by direction in the will to sell the property subject to the power, and divide the proceeds. Ratcliffe v. Hampson, 1 Jur. N. S. 1104, 4 Week. Rep. 67.

Where a person seised of lands conveyed part to the use of himself for life, with remainder, and power to charge the land so conveyed with a sum of money by a deed or will in writing under his hand and seal, which conveyance was voluntary and without valuable consideration; and afterwards he, by his last will in writing, not sealed, devised the same to his younger children,—in a bill exhibited against the grantee and heir for the same, the lord keeper decreed the land, though the will was not under seal, and the power not legally pursued. One of the reasons given for the judgment was that the son sought to be charged claimed under the same conveyance by which the power was limited. Smith v. Ashton, 1 Ch. Cas. 264, Finch, 273, Freem. Ch. 308, 8 Keble, 551, 3 Saik. 277, 64 L. R. A.

In Attv. Gen. v. Brackenbury, 1 Hurst. & C. 782, 32 L. J. Exch. N. S. 108, 9 Jur. N. S. 267, 8 L. T. N. S. 822, 11 Week. Rep. 380, the persons who took under the general residuary clause of the will of a person having a power of appointment by the will of her father were the same as those who would take by appointment if such residuary clause were a sufficient exercise of the appointment. The question in the case was as to whether the residuum left by the will of the person having the power of appointment there, was an execution of the power or not; if it was, then a legacy duty was payable in respect to so much of the residuary estate as came to him by the will of her father, and as was appointed by her will in favor of the two legatees. And it was held that the residuary clause was an exercise of the power, and the executors were bound to pay the legacy duty.

Where, in the creation of a power, it is stated that the same is to be exercised by an instrument in writing, it is so exercised by a will. Smith v. Adkins, L. R. 14 Eq. 402, 41 L. J. Ch. N. S. 628, 27 L. T. N. S. 90, 20 Week. Rep. 717.

When the mode in which a power is to be executed is not defined in its creation, an execution of the same by will is valid. Graeff v. De Turk, 44 Pa. 527.

A husband who, by virtue of his marriage settlement, had a power of appointment over lands demised to trustees, to appoint a certain sum to be raised upon the land by the trustees to the children of the marriage, made his will, and directed the land to be sold, and bequeathed portions to his children, but did not exercise the power of appointment given by his marriage settlement; and thereafter made a codicil reciting that he had directed and provided in his will that no part of the produce of the lands should be paid to his sons until the sum mentioned in his will to be paid to each daughter should have been paid to her, in addition to the equal distributive share of the sum mentioned in the marriage settlement to which each was entitled. This was held not to be an execution of the power. Pennefather v. Pennefather, Ir. Rep. 7 Eq. 300.

An instrument in the nature of a will, which is the execution of a power of appointment, is to be judged by a different rule in regard to a legatee being a witness thereto from a will proper; and so, where a testatrix had, by the will of her first husband, power of appointment over certain real estate, and she married again, and on her second marriage a settlement of personality was made for her separate use for life, together with a power to appoint the same by will or otherwise; and she had made a will appointing the real estate under the will of her first husband, and disposing of the personality settled on her second marriage; and thereafter she, by a codicil, revoked the appointment in her will, and after appointing the real estate in a different manner, bequeathed part of the personality, settled on her by her marriage settlement, to her daughter, who was an attesting witness to the codicil,—the gift to the daughter was valid as an exercise of the power. Wilkins v. Charretton, 22 Week. Rep. 598.

Where a married woman, who, by her marriage settlement, had reserved to herself a power of appointment, made her will, and, after disposing of considerable property, proceeded thus: "And as to all the rest, residue, and remainder of my said real and personal estate after answering the several purposes aforesaid, I give and bequeath the same unto the persons hereinafter appointed my executors, to be divided among them in equal shares, for their absolute benefit;" and one of the three persons named as executors died previous to the testatrix, and another was a witness to the will, and thereby became disqualified from taking under it,—it was held that the bequest was one to the executors personally, and not to them as a class, and that therefore the undivided two thirds of the property sent by the bequest was unappointed. Hoare v. Osborne, 33 L. J. Ch. N. S. 586, 10 Jur. N. S. 694, 10 L. T. N. S. 258, 12 Week. Rep. 661.

In Wilkinson v. Schneider, L. R. 9 Eq. 423, 39 L. J. Ch. N. S. 410, a married woman having the power of appointment had made her will, and by it and four codicils variously appointed the property which was the subject of the power to two of her nieces. In deciding the case, the vice chancellor said: "I do not think it is really a question of intention at all. It is a question of resulting trust, if anything. There is an absolute severance of the property. . . . I think a resulting trust must be a resulting trust always for the creator of the settlement,—the conveyer and disposer of the property. The resulting trust here must be for the persons who would be entitled if this were the appointer's property. She appointed two of the settlement trustees executors and trustees of her will; and, as far as she could, made the property, over which she had the power of appointment under the settlement, her own property."

Where, by a settlement, real estate was conveyed to trustees for the use of the husband and wife during the life of the wife, and after her death to such uses as the husband should by deed or writing appoint, with a power to the trustees to sell the property with the consent of the husband and wife during their joint lives, and lay out the money in the purchase of other lands, and, until doing so, invest it in the public funds; and thereafter the husband made his will, in which he bequeathed all money and moneys that he should die possessed of, whether in the public funds or elsewhere, and he had no money of his own in the funds, and no power of appointment other than that contained in the settlement,—it was held that the will did not operate as an exercise of the power of appointment, because the wife had a right to require the trustees to invest the stock, in which the purchase money of the real estate was held, in land; and, therefore, the stock must be considered as land at the time of the husband's death, and pass to his heir at law. Re Greaves, L. R. 23 Ch. Div. 313, 52 L. J. Ch. N. S. 753, 48 L. T. N. S. 414, 31 Week. Rep. 807.

A testator, by his will, devised his land to trustees upon trust, out of the rents, issues, and profits, in case his wife survived him, to pay unto such person or persons as she should by will appoint, a sum certain. The wife, having survived her husband, made her will, in which she directed her executors to call in, receive, and raise the moneys that she might die possessed of, and apply the same in payment of her debts and funeral expenses; and secondly, in payment of the legacies left by her. The will then provided that, in case there should be a sufficient surplus, the executors should pay to some persons, naming them, a certain sum each; and whatever money might be over and above the payment of those legacies, she requested that her executors might apply as she should direct them by letter. There was no residuary bequest, and no letter such as referred to was ever found. The property was sufficient to pay the legacies in addition to debts and funeral expenses. It was held that the will of the wife amounted to an exercise of the power given by the will of the husband, and the next of kin of the wife were entitled to the sum mentioned in the will of the husband. Re Keown, Ir. Rep. 1 Eq. 372.

In Re Ickerlingill, L. R. 17 Ch. Div. 151, 50 L. J. Ch. N. S. 384, 29 Week. Rep. 500, the question was whether the donee of the power meant, by the exercise of it, to take the property dealt with out of the instrument creating the power for all purposes, or only for the limited purpose of giving effect to the particular disposition expressed. In this case the disposition included the real estate of the testatrix, while the will in Re Davies, L. R. 13 Eq. 163, 41 L. J. Ch. N. S. 97, 25 L. T. N. S. 785, 20 Week. Rep. 165, supra, I. d. 3, only disposed of personal estate and contained a previous direction to pay debts and certain legacies.

In the present case the testatrix, after appointing her executrix, charged her property and effects with the payment of her debts and funeral and testamentary expenses. The court held that the appointees—whether as devisees or legatees—were to take the property subject to that charge, and further, that it was as though the testatrix, in substance, had said: "I am making my will. I am disposing of all the property I can dispose of, and am dealing with it as being my own." And therefore, so making her will, and so disposing of and treating the property, the result was that that part which, by reason of the death of one sister before the testatrix, lapsed, must go in the same way as the testatrix's own property would go,—to those claiming under her, and not to those claiming under the will of the donor of the power. As will be seen, in Re Davies the real question was not whether the power had been exercised, but what was the effect of its exercise.

Previous to the marriage of a woman articles of agreement were executed between her and her intended husband and a third person, by which the intended husband covenanted that the real estate belonging to his intended wife should be to their joint use during the marriage, but that she should have full power to dispose of it by deed or will during coverture. They had no issue, and she subsequently, during the coverture, made a will in the usual form, appointing executors, and giving them full power to sell her real estate, the moneys arising from which were bequeathed. It was held that this was a valid exercise of the power of appointment reserved to her under the marriage agreement, and this although she could not devise real estate, and although the power of appointment came from her instead of from another; and, in an action by her heir against her executors, it was held that, by the appointment, the estate passed in equity; and judgment was given for the defendants. Barnes v. Irwin, 2 Dall. 199, 1 L. ed. 348.

Where the will of a testator gave to his wife his property during her life, and also the power to dispose of one half thereof at her death, according to her own will and pleasure. It would be a fanciful misconstruction to hold that such power had to be exercised literally at death,—in the moment of dissolution; and a will executed eight years before her death, giving the half of the testator's property to her second husband, would take effect at her death, as an exercise of the power. New v. Potts, 55 Ga. 420.

A married woman, who was also an infant, executed a will purporting to have been made under the power, given her by the will of her father, to dispose of certain property in case of her decease without issue, "by her last will and testament, or writing in nature thereof, executed under her hand and seal, in the presence of one or more competent witnesses, notwithstanding her coverture." After becoming of full age, she executed another will, in which she stated that she revoked "all former will or wills" by her made. It was held that as, by the former will, she, being an infant, but being of sufficient age as such to make a will of personality, could only exercise the power as to that part of the estate of her father which was personality; and that, as the real estate covered by the power only passed by the latter will, which revoked the former, it was inconceivable that the testatrix should have intended the personality, constituting part of the mixed fund over which the power extended, to be governed by the former will. That it could not have been the design of the testatrix, the very moment she declared all former wills revoked, to have, by a rule of construction, an unascertained and undefined part of the fund go one way under one will, and another part go another way under another instrument; and it was held that, therefore, the power given her by her father's will was exercised by the latter will only. Van Wert v. Benedict, 1 Bradf. 114.

It is not competent, in order to show that a testator intended to execute a power of appointment, to prove his declaration or statement that he intended so to do. White v. Hicks, 33 N. Y. 383.

Where, by a will creating a power of appointment the donee thereof is clothed with the power to appoint to his children and their issue, and, for want of appointment, among said children and issue; and he has only one child,—such child, being the sole representative of his class, will take in any event, as no appointment could vary his interest, and it would be a vain act. Wickersham v. Savage, 58 Pa. 365.

The reason that the rule that an instrument purporting to be a conveyance, but incapable of taking effect as such, may operate to revoke a previous devise, is that the subsequent conveyance was inconsistent with the devise, and disclosed an intent to revoke it; but, where an instrument passes the same estate to the same person as the previous will, it can in no sense be said that what was intended to make sure is a contradiction of terms. Aubert's Appeal, 109 Pa. 447, 1 Atl. 336.

In Croft v. Slee, 4 Ves. Jr. 60, it was conceded that the power of appointment was not executed by a general disposition by will.

VI. Conclusion.

The result of an examination of the cases in the note would appear to be that, whether a power of appointment by will has been duly 64 L. R. A.

executed by the donee thereof depends entirely upon the question whether the donee of the power intended to so exercise it; and the cases given in the first division are all to that question.

Wherever the will of the donee contains a plain allusion to the power, indicating its presence in his mind at the time of making the will, the latter will always exercise the power.

And, even if there is no such allusion to the power, a reference in the donee's will to the subject of the power will show that he intended to dispose of it, and thereby execute the power.

The effect of a general provision in the will of the donee of a power of appointment has probably given rise to more discussion as to whether the power in a particular case was exercised, than any other. Ordinarily it will not suffice to execute the power under the rule of the common law. But even under that rule, it was held that, in case the will would be inoperative except as an execution of the power, there the general provision in the will would be deemed such. This was most generally decided by discovering whether the donee of the power possessed any interest aside from that over which he had the right of appointment. If he did, it was usually held that the general provision of the will was satisfied by that interest, and that the power was not executed; and conversely, that if he had no other interest than that over which he had the power of appointment, it was a good execution of the power, as otherwise the general provision of the will would be inoperative.

The question whether other circumstances than the one last stated, which might surround the donee of the power of appointment at the time of the execution of the will whereby the power was claimed to have been exercised, could be taken into consideration in ascertaining whether the donee intended to exercise the power, has given rise to some difference of opinion; but it may be said that the weight of authority is in favor of the affirmative of the proposition, and that the donee's condition, and the condition of his property, and any other fact that legitimately goes to show whether or not he intended to exercise the power, may be given in evidence, and should be considered upon the decision of that question.

But, although what has been said as to the effect of a general provision in the will of a donee of a power of appointment to execute the same is correct as to English and American law generally previous to the adoption of the statutes hereinafter mentioned, it never was the rule in Massachusetts and New Hampshire, where it was at all times held that a general provision in the will of a donee of a power of appointment would, under all circumstances, execute the power, unless a contrary intention was expressly stated or necessarily implied.

The rules at common law, as above stated (with the exception mentioned), appear to have been continued in force until the adoption of the Revised Statutes in New York in 1829. In which it was provided that "lands embraced in a power to dispose shall pass by a will purporting to convey all the real property of the testator, unless the intent that the will shall not operate as an execution of the power shall appear, expressly or by implication:" since which, as has been seen (supra, L. d. 3), the general provisions in a will will execute the power, not only as to lands, but also as to personal property.

Thereafter, in 1837, the British Parliament, by the statute ordinarily known as the "wills act" being 7 Wm. IV. & 1 & 2 Vict., passed a similar statute (in effect identical) to that of New York, only in that statute it was separately provided that a general devise and a general bequest in the will of one invested with a power of appointment would respectively execute the power as to real and personal property. Since then other states than New York have passed similar statutes, and in such as have, of course the stern rule of the common law has been largely abrogated.

It must be remembered, however, that these statutes can only relate to a case where the power of appointment is general and unlimited; and that wherever the creator or donor of the power has restricted or limited the execution of the same to a class, either as to person or property, the statutes have no application, and the rules as decided by the weight of authority, both before and since the statutes, must determine whether or not the power has been well executed.

By § 24 of the wills act, it is enacted that "every will shall be construed with reference to the real estate and personal estate comprised in it, to speak and take effect as if it had been executed immediately before the death of the testator, unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will." Similar statutes have been enacted by nearly all, if not all, of the states. Previous to the adoption of these statutes the rule was that a will containing a devise of realty took effect at the time of its execution, but that a will during the life of the testator was ambulatory in its character; and, as a testator's personal property was liable to change during his lifetime after the execution of his will, a bequest of the personality was said to speak or take effect as of the time of the death of the testator; and so in cases arising previous to the adoption of the before-mentioned statutes, a will purporting to exercise a power of appointment in regard to real estate took effect as of the date of its execution, and so, in regard to that property, the will, if executed before the creation of the power, would not execute it; but, as to the disposition of personal property under the power, the weight of authority was that, as the will as to that took effect at the death of the testator, a will made before the creation of the power was a good execution of it, although, as has been seen, there was some dissent even from this last proposition. Since the adoption of the statutes, however, the will of a person who, after its execution, is clothed with a power of appointment, is a good execution of it, the reason being that it must be presumed that, if he had not so intended, he would have revoked the provision which will operate to exercise the power.

In the investigation to ascertain the intent of the donee of a power of appointment by will, courts are frequently held to a consideration of the question as to what law governs, and the cases invariably hold that whether the power has been exercised by the will of the donee exhibiting an intention to execute it must always be decided by the law of the domicile of the donor.

ing found or conceded, the question frequently arises as to whether his attempt to do so is valid. The first question that naturally arises is as to whether, in the attempt to exercise the power, the donee thereof has made a valid will, and, as a general rule, it may be stated that, in order to execute the power, the will must be such as will be held a valid will for any and every purpose, and as such be entitled to probate.

And right here another question arises, and that is as to what law governs in deciding whether a will has been duly executed and is valid as such. While there seems to be some difference of opinion as to the law which shall govern in deciding whether there was a valid execution of the will of a donee of a power of appointment, which has been accentuated somewhat by the courts in some of the cases, it is believed that with one or two exceptions there is no real difference. It would seem from all the decisions in the note that it has been affirmed that such a will, formally executed in all respects as required by the law of the domicile of the donee of the power, will be sufficient (having all the other requirements) to execute it. But it has also been held in one case, and the proposition seems to have been affirmed by the privy council, that where the will was a good execution of the power according to the law of the domicile of the donor and the situs of the property, it was a valid exercise of the appointment, even though not according to the testamentary law of the foreign country which was the domicile of the donee of the power at the time of the execution of the will.

The question as to the essential validity of the will of the donee of a power of appointment would seem to be governed by the law of the domicile of the donor.

Where, by the instrument creating the power, the execution of the same is limited to a class, the effect of the exclusion of a member of the class has led to some discussion, and the authorities agree that it will invalidate the appointment.

A still more interesting question is, What is the effect of the provisions of the will of a donee of a power of appointment which attempts to execute a power of appointment limited to a class, including one not a member of the class? The authorities are agreed that it certainly has the effect to render the appointment invalid as to the person not an object of the same; but, as to whether such a provision in the will of the donee will operate to render the whole appointment invalid, there seems to be some difference, with the weight of authority in favor of the proposition that it only operates as far as stated, and that, so far as the provision relates to those who are proper objects of the power, it is a good execution.

Under the earlier English decisions, it was held that, where the power of appointment in its creation was limited to a class, there must be, not only no exclusion of a member of the class, but that each person therein must receive something more than a nominal gift, or the appointment will be held invalid as being illusory. The later authorities, however, all go to the effect that, so long as the appointing power is left in the discretion of the donee thereof, any gift to each member of the limited class will be sufficient, no matter how disproportionate to other gifts to other members.

Whether the creation by the will of the donee of a power of appointment of a trust is a valid execution of the power, as has been seen, depends upon the particular circumstances of each case; as does also the question as to when the power has been exhausted, or when there remains a right to revoke a former appointment and make a new one.

This is also true as to the question as to whether, when a power of appointment is given to the survivor of two or more persons, it may be duly executed by the will of the donee of the one of them who happens to be the survivor, although made in the lifetime of one of the others. A power of appointment may be exercised at different times and by different acts. Where the exercise of a power of appointment is limited to a will, it can never be exercised by a deed in the lifetime of the donee of the power; and so, also, where it is prescribed in the instrument creating the power that it shall be exercised by deed, it cannot be exercised by the will of the donee.

A gift in the will of the donee of a power of appointment of a less estate than provided by the instrument of its creation is a valid execution of the power.

Where trust and confidence are reposed in the donee of a power of appointment the power cannot be delegated; but it would seem that where the power is general in every sense, and not in any manner limited, it may be.

Where a power of appointment by will is attempted to be exercised by the donee thereof for a consideration or benefit, it will be invalid as an execution of the power. The exercise of a power of appointment in favor of a charity is always looked upon by the courts with liberality; and, wherever it is possible to hold that there is an intention to exercise it, it will be done in such case.

It is hardly necessary to say that, when an apparent power in an instrument is, in effect, an absolute gift, the will of the apparent donee will dispose of it. Sometimes in the attempt to exercise the power, where there seems to be no question but that the donee thereof intended to execute it by the will, yet for some reason the court has felt compelled to hold that the execution was defective; and in such case equity will generally relieve against such defective exercise. But it must be a defect in the exercise of the power, and not the actual supply of the intention, which is so essential to the execution, as, in no event, will a court of equity do for the donee of a power what is solely within his discretion to do or leave undone.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT.

BANK OF CALIFORNIA, Appt.,
v.
CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO, Respt.

(142 Cal. 276.)

1. The right to exist as a corporation is a franchise which may be assessed for taxation to the corporation, instead of the members or stockholders.
2. The right to exist as a corporation may be taxed as property, and the tax need not be in the form of an excise tax.
3. A constitutional declaration that "property," for the purpose of taxation, shall include franchises, authorizes taxation of the right to exist as a corporation.
4. The value of the shares of corporate stock may be taken into consideration in assessing the corporate franchises for taxation.
5. The courts will not revise the honest judgment of the officials to whom is committed the assessment for taxation of the franchises of a corporation in fixing the taxable value of such franchises.
6. That a corporation is engaged in a business which an individual might carry on without payment of any tax or license fee does not render the imposition of a tax upon its franchises an unlawful discrimination prohibited by U. S. Const., Amend. 14.

(February 18, 1904.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for the City and County of San Francisco in favor of defendants in a suit to annul a tax assessment, and to recover back money paid under protest because of it. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John Garber, with Mr. James M. Allen, for appellant.

Messrs. Franklin K. Lane and W. I. Brobeck for respondent.

Angellotti, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought by plaintiff corporation to have an assessment of its franchise for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, declared illegal and void, and to recover from defendant $12,187.76 paid by it, under protest, as taxes thereon. Defendant had judgment in the court below, and plaintiff appeals therefrom, on the judgment roll.

The claim of the plaintiff is that it has never owned or possessed any franchise whatever, and that the only franchise in any way connected with it is the corporate franchise, or the franchise of being a corporation, which it is claimed is the property of its stockholders, and is not assessable or taxable to said corporation. The assessor of defendant, in addition to assessing the assessable, tangible property of the plaintiff, situate in said city and county, consisting of land, improvements, furniture, library, typewriter, and money, at $2,311,774, assessed its "franchise" at $750,000, and the board of equalization of the city and county refused to lower said assessment, or "give plaintiff any relief whatever." The tax on said $750,000 so assessed on the franchise amounted to $12,187.76, which was paid under protest.

It appears from the findings of the trial court that the plaintiff was incorporated in the year 1864, under the provisions of the act providing for the formation of corporations for certain purposes, approved April 14, 1853, and all acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, for the purpose of carrying on the business of banking, and has ever since conducted such business under its articles of incorporation, and that it has never owned, possessed, claimed, or controlled any other rights, powers, privileges, or franchises than such as were acquired or conferred upon it by said articles of incorporation. It further appears that the assessor found that the aggregate value of the tangible property of plaintiff, including nonassessable bonds, and property not assessable in San Francisco, and all property assessable therein, was $5,158,903.08; that the aggregate market value of all the shares of capital stock issued by plaintiff was $8,100,000; and that the difference between the aggregate market value of said stock and the value of all tangible property of the corporation, to wit, $2,943,096.92, was by him ascertained and determined to be the value of the so-called franchise of plaintiff, which he thereupon assessed and valued, for purposes of assessment and taxation, at the sum of $750,000.

The only franchise acquired under the articles of incorporation—and the findings in this case establish the fact that the corporation has no other franchise—was the right to be and exist as a corporation, with all the powers given by law to corporations, and the right to enjoy the privilege and immunities of a corporation in the conduct of the business of banking. Admittedly, the mere right to do a banking business is not a franchise, in any sense of the word. It belongs to citizens generally, and is a common right, in the same sense that the right to do a grocery or dry goods business is available to all citizens; and no grant from the sovereign is essential to its existence. Any individual, or any number of individuals may, under such regulations as the state, in the exercise of its police powers, may legally make, engage therein, without any grant from the state. While, however, the right to engage in the business of banking is a common right, available to all citizens, such right can be exercised through the agency of a corporation only by express permission of the state. Corporations, being purely creatures of the law, may be formed only when the state so authorizes, and then only for such purposes as may be authorized by the state. It is universally recognized that the power of creating corporations is one appertaining to sovereignty, and can only be exercised by that branch of the government in which it is legally vested, and that, whatever method may be adopted for their formation, and with whatever liberality the privilege of forming them may be conferred, every corporation is dependent for its existence upon the permission of the state in which it is created. While our law provides that private corporations may be formed by any five or more persons, a majority of whom are residents of the state, for any purpose for which individuals may lawfully associate themselves, each corporation so created derives its right to exist as a corporation, with all the incidents thereof, for the purpose of doing the business specified in its articles of incorporation, directly from the sovereign power, precisely the same as the corporation that formerly existed in England under special grant from the King, and later under special act of Parliament, or the corporation that in this country exists under special act of the legislative department of any of our states. Whenever a corporation is legally formed, the right to be and exist as such, and, as a corporation, to do the business specified in its articles, whether it be a banking business, grocery business, or the operation of a railroad, or any other business in which individuals may engage without grant from the state, is a grant by the sovereign power,—a valuable right, which is generally known as the "corporate franchise." 2 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 922; Spring Valley Water-Works v. Schottler, 52 Cal. 69, 106; Horn Silver Min. Co. v. New York, 143 U. S. 305, 36 L. ed. 164, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 57, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 403; *Central P. R. In the case of Horn Silver Min. Co. v. New York, 143 U. S. 305, 36 L. ed. 164, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 57, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 403, the Supreme Court of the United States, speaking of this kind of franchise, said: "Its [the corporation's] creation . . . is the investing of two or more persons with the capacity to act as a single individual, with a common name, and the privilege of succession in its members, without dissolution, and with a limited individual liability. The right and privilege, or the franchise, as it may be termed, of being a corporation, is of great value to its members, and is considered as property separate and distinct from the property which the corporation itself may acquire. According to the law of most states, this franchise or privilege of being a corporation is deemed personal property, and is subject to separate taxation." This corporate franchise, viz., the franchise to be and exist as a corporation for the purposes specified in the articles of incorporation, appertains to every corporation, for whatever purpose it may be formed; and there is no distinction in this regard between the banking or grocery corporation and the railroad, water, or gas corporation. The right to engage in every such business is open to all citizens, independent of any grant from the sovereign; but it is available to no one to conduct any such business through the agency of a corporation without such grant. Certain occupations are, however, of such a nature that various privileges conferrable only by the sovereign power are convenient and in most cases absolutely essential to the successful maintenance of the business to be carried on, whether it be carried on by a corporation or by an individual,—such, for instance, as the right to use public highways. Such rights and privileges are also known as franchises, but they constitute a class entirely distinct from and independent of the corporate franchise. Such rights and privileges are, of course, the property of the corporation or individual by whom they have been acquired, and are taxable as such.

As already shown, the corporate franchise is considered as property separate and distinct from the so-called franchises which the corporation may acquire subsequent to its incorporation. The plaintiff claims that, because it has acquired and is exercising no such rights, it has no franchise. The basis of this claim is the contention that this corporate franchise is not a franchise of the corporation, but vests in and belongs to the members of the corporation. In a certain sense, it is true that such a franchise is the property of the members of the corporation. It has been often said that a corporation is itself a franchise belonging to the members of the corporation, and a corporation may hold other franchises as rights or franchises of the corporation. Expressions of this character have been used for the purpose of distinguishing the rights and privileges which the corporation, as a legal being, subsequently acquires and controls, and which, when transferable, may be transferred by the corporation itself, from the franchise of being and existing as a corporation, which is incapable of assignment, and which survives "in the mere fact of corporate existence" after all property capable of assignment has been transferred to others by the corporation. The corporation is, however, nothing other than its stockholders or members, transformed into and existing as one legal being by permission of the state. The incorporators and their associates and successors are the "body politic or corporate by the name stated in the certificate" (Civil Code, § 296), and, as such body politic or corporate, they hold the right to exist and transact the business specified in the articles. They hold the right in their collective capacity as a corporation, and not severally as persons. They have no rights in regard to the corporate franchise that they can exercise, except through the corporation. It is the corporation, the "body politic or corporate," the legal creature comprised of the incorporators, their associates and successors, that is invested by the state with life and the power to do. It was said by the Supreme Court of the United States in Society for Savings v. Coite, 6 Wall. 594, 606, 18 L. ed. 897, 902: "Corporate franchises are legal estates vested in the corporation itself as soon as it is in esse. They are not mere naked powers granted to the corporation, but powers coupled with an interest, which vest in the corporation upon the possession of its franchises; and, whatever may be thought of the corporators, it cannot be denied that the corporation itself has a legal interest in such franchises."

If this corporate franchise is assessable as property, then, that it must be assessed to the corporation, instead of the members or stockholders, is clearly settled in this state by the decision in People ex rel. Burke v. Badlam, 57 Cal. 594, where it was held that a stockholder could not be assessed upon his certificate of stock, inasmuch as his shares were simply an interest in the very property held by the corporation, and the assessment of all the property of the corporation covered everything represented by the certificate. See also § 3608, Pol. Code.

It is not claimed that a corporate franchise may not be taxed by a state, but it is urged that such tax has always been an excise tax, and not a tax on property. An examination of the authorities will disclose the fact that in many cases it has been directly taxed as property. The manner and method, however, are entirely within the control of the state, which is supreme in such matters, so long as no constitutional right is impaired. As already shown, such a franchise is property. Mr. Justice Field, speaking for the Supreme Court of the United States in Horn Silver Min. Co. v. New York, 143 U. S. 305, 36 L. ed. 164, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 57, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 403, after saying that such a franchise is property, and is subject to separate taxation, said: "The right of the states to thus tax it has been recognized by this court and the state courts in instances without number, . . . 'and the manner in which its value shall be assessed and the rate . . . are mere matters of legislative discretion,' except . . . as controlled by the organic law of the state." The same court said in Hamilton Mfg. Co. v. Massachusetts, 6 Wall. 632, 638, 18 L. ed. 904, 906, that "corporate franchises . . . are legal estates, and not mere naked powers granted to the corporation, but powers coupled with an interest which vest in the corporation by virtue of their charter; and the rule is equally well settled that the privileges and franchises of a private corporation, unless exempted in terms which amount to a contract, are as much the legitimate subjects of taxation as any other property of the citizens within the sovereignty of the state." See also Society for Savings v. Coite, 6 Wall. 594, 606, 18 L. ed. 897, 902. In Central P. R. Co. v. California, 162 U. S. 91, 125, 40 L. ed. 903, 914, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 766, the Supreme Court of the United States, speaking of a tax on the state franchise of a railroad corporation, said that if the corporation procured any rights or privileges, otherwise called "franchises," from the state, they were taxable, and the extent of their value was to be determined by the board of equalization. The court, after saying that, under the laws of California, the plaintiff obtained from the state the right and privilege of corporate capacity and other rights, said that it is not to be denied that such rights and privileges have value, and constitute taxable property. In State ex rel. Milwaukee Street R. Co. v. Anderson, 90 Wis. 550, 580, 63 N. W. 746, the supreme court of Wisconsin, after saying that the franchises of the Milwaukee Street Railway Company, whether of existence or for the operation of its track, are, beyond dispute, the property of the corporation and assessable as such, said—the method of taxation in that state being upon the valuation of property taxed, and the state not providing for a certain, specific tax on franchises like an excise rate—that they should be regarded as personal estate for purposes of taxation in the district in which the corporation has its principal place of business, and that the proper officers should fix the 64 L. R. A.

value. See cases cited in opinion in that case. Mr. Cooley says in his work on Taxation (p. 686, 3d ed.): "In some states all taxation, as far as possible, is brought to an ad valorem standard. Franchises are property, and in such states may be taxed by a valuation, being estimated for the purpose either separately, or as a part of the aggregate corporate property."

The Ohio, Indiana, and Kentucky methods of taxation, upheld by the court (see State ex rel. Poe v. Jones, 51 Ohio St. 492, 37 N. E. 945; Adams Exp. Co. v. Ohio State Auditor, 165 U. S. 194, 41 L. ed. 683, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 305, 166 U. S. 185, 41 L. ed. 965, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 604; Adams Exp. Co. v. Kentucky, 166 U. S. 171, 41 L. ed. 980, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 527; Adams Exp. Co. v. Indiana, 165 U. S. 255, 41 L. ed. 707, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 991), while contemplating the assessment of all the property of certain kinds of corporations, tangible and intangible, as an entirety, necessarily involved therein the inclusion of the corporate franchise as a part of the property of the corporation. See also State Railroad Tax Cases, 92 U. S. 575, 23 L. ed. 663; Ottawa Glass Co. v. McCaleb, 81 Ill. 556. The case of Louisville Tobacco Warehouse Co. v. Com. 106 Ky. 165, 57 L. R. A. 33, 49 S. W. 1069, relied on by plaintiff, was decided by a bare majority of the supreme court of Kentucky, upon a statute specifically naming many kinds of corporations, including banking corporations, as liable to a property tax on the corporate franchise, and declaring "every other like corporation" liable to the same tax, and also every corporation, company, or association having or exercising any special or exclusive privilege or franchise; and it was simply held that a mere private business corporation, of a kind not specifically named and having no special or exclusive privilege or franchise, not allowed by law to natural persons, was not intended to be included by the statute. In several cases where it was said that the tax upon a corporate franchise could be sustained only upon the ground that it was an excise tax, the tax would have been invalid as a property tax solely for the reason that it was, in effect, levied on property exempt from state taxation under the laws of the United States. See Home Ins. Co. v. New York, 134 U. S. 594, 597, 33 L. ed. 1025, 1029, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 593. The power of a state to impose a tax on the franchise of a corporation in the nature of an excise or duty does not, however, exclude the taxation, in a proper case, by a valuation made by the assessor. Spring Valley Waterworks v. Schottler, 62 Cal. 69, 112. Under the authorities, there can be no question that a state may provide for the taxation of a corporate franchise as property of the corporation.

It is further contended that a corporate franchise is not a franchise, within the meaning of the provisions of our state Constitution relating to taxation, and that this state has made no provision authorizing an assessment thereof. The question thus presented can hardly be said to be a debatable one, in view of certain decisions of this court rendered shortly after our present state Constitution went into effect, determining the effect of the provisions of such Constitution in the matter of the taxation of property of corporations. The Constitution adopted in 1879, after providing that all property in the state, not exempt under the laws of the United States, shall be taxed in proportion to its value, declares that the word "property," as used in this connection, includes "moneys, credits, bonds, stocks, dues, franchises, and all other matters and things, real, personal, and mixed, capable of private ownership." Const. art. 13, § 1. The legislature thereupon repealed § 3640 of the Political Code, providing for the assessment of shares of stock to the owners thereof, the assessable value thereof to be determined by deducting from the market value of the entire capital stock the value of all property assessed to it, and dividing the remainder by the entire number of shares, and added a new section to that Code (§ 3608), in which they declared that shares of stock in corporations possess no intrinsic value over and above the actual value of the property of the corporation which they represent; that the assessment and taxation of such shares, and also of the corporate property, would be double taxation; that all property belonging to corporations shall be assessed and taxed, but that no assessment shall be made of shares of stock. Amendments to Codes (1881) pp. 56, 59, chap. 53. Immediately after the enactment of this legislation, the question of the liability of shares of stock in corporations to assessment to the holders thereof came before this court. It was held that the language of the Constitution clearly forbade double taxation; that the legislature had the right thereunder to say that all the property of the corporation should be assessed to the corporation, and the same property should not again be assessed for the same tax; that the "property" of the corporation included its franchise, and everything else evidenced by the certificates of stock; that, while the share of each stockholder was undoubtedly property, it was an interest in the very property held by the corporation, and nothing more; and that when all the property of the corporation, including its franchise, was assessed, which it was to be presumed would be done by the assessor in obedience to the requirements of the law, any further assessment of the shares to the individual stockholders would be double taxation. People ex rel. Burke v. Badlam, 57 Cal. 594. This case necessarily involved the question as to the constitutionality of § 3608, Pol. Code, prohibiting the assessment of shares of stock to the holders thereof. Such shares being undoubtedly property, unless they were otherwise assessed the section was clearly unconstitutional, in view of the provision of the Constitution requiring all property to be taxed. According to the decision of the court, they were, under the law, to be otherwise assessed; i. e., everything represented by the certificates was to be assessed to the corporation. See also San Francisco v. Mackey, 21 Fed. 539.

In the later case of Spring Valley Waterworks v. Schottler, 62 Cal. 69, 117, this court, speaking of the repeal of § 3640, Pol. Code, and the enactment of § 3608, Pol. Code, already noticed, after stating that under the scheme provided by § 3640 the whole property of the corporation, including franchise, would have been taxed, by the taxation of the shares to the owner in the manner indicated therein, said that by the repeal of such section, and the enactment of § 3608, it was, without doubt, the intention of the legislature that everything entering into and giving value to the shares should be taxed as property of the corporation. This case involved the question as to the validity of the action of the board of supervisors of San Francisco, sitting as a board of equalization, raising the assessment of the franchise of the plaintiff from $5,000 to $5,000,000. It appeared from the record in the case that the supervisors held the difference between the value of the tangible property of the corporation and the aggregate market value of the shares of stock in the company to be the value of the franchise. Practically every objection made to the assessment here involved was made in that case by eminent attorneys representing various corporations, including this plaintiff. The opinion of the court, signed by all of the six justices who participated in the case, overruling each of the objections, has been, so far as the records of this court show, accepted up to this time as a correct exposition of the law of California relative to the taxation of franchises of corporations. While the plaintiff in that case possessed the right to lay down pipes in the streets, alleys, and ways of a city, and to collect rates for water furnished, which were said to be franchises, it was, in terms, declared by the court that its existence and right to employ its corporate powers is a franchise; and the court said in regard thereto: "We have no doubt that it was the intention of those who framed and ratified the Constitution to place such franchises in the category of property to be taxed. . . . To hold that a private corporation does not own its franchise right, power, and privileges, would be both novel and untenable. . . . The franchise of a corporation is, and can be well defined to be, the right of the corporation to exist and exercise the powers and privileges vested in it by its charter. . . . From the foregoing cases, it would seem that there can be no doubt of the power of a state to tax the franchise at its assessed value." Commenting on the decision in People ex rel. Burke v. Badlam, 57 Cal. 594, the court said that in that case it was held that the franchise of a corporation of the character of those named in the petition therein, which included a banking company, a gaslight company, a smelting and lead company, and a water company, is taxable property of the corporation. It was further declared that the tax must be according to the valuation made by the officer appointed for that purpose, subject to equalization by the board of equalization. The method of determining the value of the franchises there employed was declared by the court to have been held to be within the powers of the assessor in San José Gas Co. v. January, 57 Cal. 614, and impliedly approved as a correct mode in Pepple ex rel. Burke v. Badlam, 57 Cal. 594. See also Spring Valley Waterworks v. Barber, 99 Cal. 36, 21 L. R. A. 416, 33 Pac. 735; San José Gas Co. v. January, 57 Cal. 614; London & S. F. Bank v. Block, 117 Fed. 900.

It is sought to distinguish the case at bar from those of Spring Valley Waterworks v. Schottler, 62 Cal. 69; Spring Valley Waterworks v. Barber, 99 Cal. 36, 21 L. R. A. 416, 33 Pac. 735, and San José Gas Co. v. January, 57 Cal. 614, upon the ground that, in each of the cases cited, other franchises were possessed by the corporations; the waterworks having and exercising the right to lay pipes in the streets, ways, and alleys of the city, and to collect rates for water furnished, and the gas company having and exercising the right to use the streets and lay pipes therein for supplying a city with gas. The distinction is in no way material to the controversy here. As already shown, it was definitely determined in Spring Valley Waterworks v. Schottler, 62 Cal. 69, that, whatever other franchises the water corporation possessed, its existence and right to employ its corporate powers was a franchise, constituting taxable property. Aside from this, however, the other rights possessed by the waterworks and gas company were rights granted by express provisions of the Constitution to every individual in the state, 64 L. R. A.

and to every company incorporated under the laws of the state for the purpose of supplying any municipality and its inhabitants with water or artificial light. Const. art. 11, § 19, and article 14. While the generality of the grant does not deprive such rights of the character of franchises, they have value only so far as the exercise thereof contributes to the value of the capital of the corporation, and are precisely the same in this respect as the exercise of the corporate franchise. As was aptly said of such other rights or franchises by counsel in Spring Valley Waterworks v. Schottler, no one can sell them, for everybody has them, and no person can gain by the accession of such rights of others.

It is urged that the assessment on the corporate franchise is, in this case, grossly unjust as to amount; that the assessor's method of arriving at such valuation is improper and unjust; and that it includes such elements as dividends or profits, earning power, and good will. The assessed value of the franchise, it will be observed, is a fraction over 25 per cent of the total value of the intangible property of the corporation, ascertained by a deduction of the value of the tangible property from the market value of the shares of stock.

The value of the franchises of a corporation is not limited by the cost of obtaining them. If it were so limited, such franchises as the right to use the public streets for water pipes or gas pipes for the purpose of supplying a municipality and its inhabitants with water or gas would be valueless and unassessable, for everybody possesses such rights under the terms of our Constitution. It is the exercise of the right that gives the value that our laws require to be taxed. As was said in San José Gas Co. v. January, 57 Cal. 614, 616: "In a pecuniary sense, the value of franchises may be as various as the objects for which they exist, and the methods by which they are employed, and may change with every moment of time; but that franchises are property, and are to be taxed in some method in proportion to value, is a part of the paramount law of this state." In the same case it was said by the court, speaking of the method employed by the assessor in arriving at the valuation of certain mains: "The duty of making the valuation was cast upon the assessor. The method of arriving at the valuation, the process by which his mind reached the conclusion (in case where, as here, it is not pretended that he acted fraudulently or dishonestly) is matter committed to his determination. . . . If he erred in his judgment, the remedy was by application to the board of equalization, and the courts will not revise the judgments of these officers upon such questions." This appears to be determinative of the contention here made. While the complaint herein alleged fraudulent motives on the part of the assessor, the allegation was denied, and no finding was made therein, and no point is made as to the failure of the court to make such finding. Whether or not the whole difference between the aggregate market value of the shares of stock and the value of the tangible property, viz., $2,943,096.92, was the value of the franchise, the assessor certainly had the right to take the value of the shares into consideration in determining the value of the franchise; and, were we at liberty to review the judgment of the assessor and of the board of equalization upon those matters, we could not say that an assessment of $750,000 thereon is unjust, or that it includes such elements as dividend or profit earning power, or good will, which, it is claimed, should not be taken into consideration in determining the value of the property of the corporation. In this connection, it will be observed that these elements, so far as they may enter into the value of shares of stock, would be included in an assessment of such shares to the stockholders,—a method of assessment which the state is at liberty to adopt (in fact, bound to adopt), unless such shares are otherwise covered by the assessment of the property of the corporation. It is clear that, if the laws of this state properly express the intention that everything that gives value to the shares of a corporation shall be assessed as property of the corporation, the true value of those shares is a most important element in determining the value of such property.

Finally, it is urged that the assessment is in violation of the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, in that a corporation is thereby compelled to pay a tax of $12,187.76 for carrying on a "common business—banking—that everyone has a right to carry on," while any person or partnership may carry on the same business without paying any tax. If this contention be well founded, it, of course, follows that no tax whatever can be imposed by any state on the corporate franchise of any corporation which is engaged in a business open to all who choose to engage therein. In view of the many decisions of the United States Supreme Court already cited, upholding the taxation by states of corporate franchises, it would appear unnecessary to further discuss this claim. As was said by the learned circuit judge in London & S. F. Bank v. Block, 117 Fed. 900, in upholding an assessment on such a corporate franchise, "The assessment is not . . . upon the business or occupation of a banker, but upon the property of the complainant embraced in the unity of the franchise of the corporation to have perpetual succession, to have a common seal, and to act in all its business transactions of a general banking business with those special advantages which are incident to corporate existence." A person or partnership engaged in the same business has no such property.

The judgment of the Superior Court is affirmed.

McFarland, J., dissenting:

I dissent, and at some future time, if other duties permit, will express my views on the question here involved more fully. At present I will say only this:

1. The only assessment actually made was of appellant's "franchise." This attempted assessment was, under any view, void for want of description. If there be any particular property embraced under the general category "franchise" which is assessable, such particular property must be described in some manner sufficient to identify it. The mere word "franchise" is no more descriptive of any particular property than would be the words "an easement," or "a piece of land."

2. It appears, however, that the only franchise of appellant intended to be assessed was its mere franchise to be a corporation. But such a franchise, assuming it to belong to the corporation, and not to the stockholders, is not assessable, because it has no ascertainable value, under the rule prescribed by the state Constitution and the statute for determining assessable value. Const. art. 13, § 1; Pol. Code, § 3617. It cannot be transferred by the owner, nor seized and sold under execution or other process of law, and is not in any way vendible. In this respect it cannot be distinguished from a seat in a stock board, which was held in Lowenberg v. Greenebaum, 99 Cal. 162, 21 L. R. A. 309, 37 Am. St. Rep. 42, 33 Pac. 794, not to be property in the sense that it could be seized and sold.

3. The assessor reached the conclusion that this franchise was of the value of $750,000, at which amount he assessed it, by the process of deducting the total value at which all the tangible property of the appellant had been assessed from the value of all the shares of its capital stock, as shown by sales thereof in the market. This was not fixing the value of the only franchise attempted to be assessed, to wit, the right to be a corporation. It was merely an attempt to assess the good will of the appellant as a business concern, and was an unlawful discrimination against the appellant, and in favor of partnerships, individuals, and all other "persons" whose tangible property alone is assessed, and not the good will of their established business. The value of the franchise to be a corporation is not affected by the fact that the corporation afterwards does a successful or unsuccessful business.

Beatty, Ch. J., dissenting:

I agree with Justice McFarland that the mere franchise to be a banking corporation is not susceptible of valuation according to the criterion of value established by the statute. Pol. Code, § 3617, subd. 5. It is not transferable or vendible, any more than a broker's seat in the stock and exchange board; and, unless we are prepared to overrule the decision in San Francisco v. Anderson, 103 Cal. 70, 42 Am. St. Rep. 98, 36 Pac. 1034, and at the same time to pronounce the Code definition of "value" unconstitutional, I cannot see how the judgment in this case can be affirmed. The invalidity of the assessment of appellant's franchise is to my mind much clearer than that of the broker's seat, for it was made to appear in the case cited that the privileges attaching to a seat in the stock board were of considerable pecuniary value to the member, whereas there is nothing to show that the right to conduct the banking business is of any greater value to a corporation than to a copartnership, and in case of a partnership it is not regarded as having any value whatever. The truth is that when, as in this case, a valuation of a franchise of a banking or trading corporation is made by taking the whole or a part of the difference between the market value of its shares and the value of its tangible assets, such valuation necessarily includes, and is mainly, if not wholly, composed of, the value of the good will of the business, and the franchise has little or nothing to do with it. Whether the good will of a business is subject to taxation, or not, is a question never decided by this court; but, conceding it to be property liable to taxation, I am clear that it should be assessed eo nomine, and assessed equally to all persons, natural and artificial. If it be true, as contended by appellant, that good will is never assessed to natural persons, it is an unjust discrimination to assess it to corporations merely because the market price of their shares affords a means of estimating its value. Upon the grounds thus briefly indicated, I dissent from the judgment.

COLORADO SUPREME COURT.

JEFFERSON MINING COMPANY, Appt.,
v.
ANCHORIA-LELAND MINING & MILL-ING COMPANY.

(.....Colo.....)

1. The determination by the government officials after notice to adverse claimants of the priority of a mining location and the issuance of a patent therefor is conclusive upon the question of seniority of location.
2. When one attacking a patent to a mining location is permitted, against the objection of his adversary, to go behind the patent and introduce evidence as to the priority of location, he cannot complain if his adversary is permitted to introduce evidence showing that his own location is the prior one.
3. A new trial cannot be granted for surprise in the case made by the evidence which the court permitted to be introduced, where there is nothing to show that the complaining party would be able to fortify or strengthen the case which he has made.

4. The right to follow a vein on its dip does not apply in favor of a patentee of a lode mining claim the exterior boundaries of which include a portion of a claim already patented to another, which includes a portion of the apex of the vein, so as to enable the second patentee to follow the dip of the portion of the apex within the limits of his patent into the territory already patented to the prior claimant.

land Mining & Milling Company, is the owner of the Anchor, and the Jefferson Mining Company, appellant and defendant below, owns the Mattie L. claim. The Anchor went first to patent October 5, 1894, without adverse or protest by the owners of the Mattie L., and the patent includes the entire surface in conflict. A patent was issued for the Mattie L. November 3, 1896, in which the conflicting surface ground is expressly excepted from the grant. The Mattie L. as actually located is across, instead of along, the course of the discovery vein, as subsequent developments of the claim show, so that what its locators believed to be, and so designated as, its end lines are in law its side lines, and its side lines are its end lines, so far as concerns extralateral rights. The Anchor location was along the course of its discovery vein, so that its located end lines are the legal end lines for all veins that have their apex within its boundaries. The relative positions of the two locations, and the patented area of each, and the segment of the vein in controversy, are shown with sufficient accuracy by the following diagram:

From the agreed statement, in addition to the facts already recited, it appears that what is called in the record a secondary vein, as distinguished from the discovery vein, and delineated on the diagram as a-b, enters the exterior boundaries of the Mattie L. across the easterly boundary line thereof about 510 feet southerly from corner No. 1 of that location, and thence continues, substantially parallel with the discovery vein (which is near the northern boundary), on a southwesterly course across its patented surface, and thence across the Anchor claim, entering it at the north, and departing from it at the south, side line. This vein has a dip to the southeast, and the ore in controversy is situated in that segment of the vein, a-b, under the surface of the Anchor claim, and within vertical planes drawn downwards through its side and end lines.

controversy, and began to extract and remove ore from such segment of the vein; whereupon this action was brought by the Anchoria Company, as the owner of the Anchor claim, to restrain the Jefferson Company, the owner of the Mattie L., from continuing such work. Further reference is made in the opinion to the evidence introduced by both parties supplementing the agreed statement of facts.

The court made findings of fact in favor of the plaintiff company, establishing the seniority of the Anchor claim, and permanently enjoined defendant from removing any ore lying beneath the surface of the Anchor claim and within vertical planes drawn downwards through its side lines and end lines.

Messrs. D. P. Howard and Morrison & De Soto, for appellant:

Where the patentee has the apexes of several lodes within his survey lines, he can have only one set of end lines, which determine the planes within which he can follow his veins, which dip, perhaps, at different angles and in different directions.

When the apex of a vein passes out of the side line of a claim into an adjoining claim, the latter, though junior in date, gives to its owner the right to follow the vein on its dip underneath the senior claim.

Colorado Cent. Consol. Min. Co. v. Turck, 4 C. C. A. 313, 12 U. S. App. 85, 54 Fed. 263.

Where a patentee follows his lode on the dip, he can so follow it only in the same direction and between the same planes as he is allowed to follow his discovery vein. He can follow any vein in any direction within his side lines and end lines vertically extended; but if, in so following a vein, he reaches a point where the apex of such vein is held by a patent, the owner of such patent has the right to follow the vein.

Where there are surface outcroppings from the same vein within the boundaries of two claims, the one first located necessarily carries the right to work the vein.

Argentine Min. Co. v. Terrible Min. Co. 122 U. S. 478, 30 L. ed. 1140, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1356.

The patentee has the right to everything found within his lines, unless another has located or patented the apex of the vein within his ground, in which case such other party can follow on the dip so as to cover the contested vein.

Campbell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The positions taken by the parties may thus be stated: Appellant's contentions are, first, that, in law and in fact, the Mattie L. is senior to the Anchor, and therefore entitled to the ore in controversy because of its priority under the doctrine governing its intraliminal rights; second, that, regardless of the question of seniority, as to the secondary vein, a-b, the Mattie L. has extralateral rights southerly on the dip of that vein between what its locators considered its parallel side lines, but which in law are parallel end lines, and this covers the segment in dispute; third, that the Anchor claim, although it has within its exterior boundaries a portion of the apex of this particular vein, is not entitled to the ore in controversy within the parallelogram, c. x, e, f, but the same belongs to the Jefferson Mining Company, the owner of the apex of the vein, a-b, northeasterly from x. Each of these propositions is controverted by appellee, and we shall discuss them, but not in the order pursued by counsel in their briefs.

It is to be observed again that a-b is not the discovery vein of either location, but the parties seem to agree that, under the facts of this case, their respective rights thereto, whether intraliminal or extralateral, are not different from what they would be were both locations based upon it as such.

1. In one branch of the argument of appellant's learned counsel they say that the question as to which is the senior location is the vital one in the case. This is so because there are surface outcroppings of the same vein within the boundaries of two lode mining claims which conflict on the surface. In such circumstances appellant asserts, and appellee concedes, that the claim first located necessarily carries the right to work the vein, and they both cite and rely upon: Argentine Min. Co. v. Terrible Min. Co. 122 U. S. 478, 30 L. ed. 1140, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1356; Tyler Min. Co. v. Sweeney, 4 C. C. A. 329, 7 U. S. App. 463, 54 Fed. 284; Last Chance Min. Co. v. Tyler Min. Co. 9 C. C. A. 613, 15 U. S. App. 456, 61 Fed. 557, 157 U. S. 683, 39 L. ed. 859, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 733; Tyler Min. Co. v. Sweeney, 24 C. C. A. 578, 48 U. S. App. 203, 79 Fed. 277, 279.

In the last case it was said that the ore body in dispute is on the dip of the lode or vein within the extended vertical planes of the end lines of the Tyler claim, and also within the side lines of the Last Chance claim, and on the dip of the vein as it passed through that claim, and it was there said that "the question as to which claim was first located necessarily determines the rights of the respective parties." Applying this principle to the present case concretely, it may be said that the ore in controversy here is on the dip of the lode, a-b, between the extended vertical planes of the legal end lines of the Mattie L. claim. It is also within the side lines of the Anchor claim, and on the dip of the vein as it passes through that claim. If the reasoning and conclusion in the Tyler-Sweeney Case, 24 C. C. A. 578, 48 U. S. App. 203, 79 Fed. 277, 64 L. R. A.

are right,—and both parties here agree that they are,—then it seems logically to follow that the senior location is entitled to the ore in controversy. It may be that the facts of this case differentiate it from those cited, and that the principle therein established does not apply here. And while it may not be necessary for us to rest our decision solely upon the question as to the seniority of the respective locations, yet, as both parties deem it vital, we first inquire which is the older location?

These claims overlap on the surface. The Anchor applied for, and first received, its patent, and no protest or adverse was made thereto by the owners of the Mattie L. The United States statute governing such applications provides for ample notice, which is equivalent to a summons in a judicial proceeding, and he who fails to heed it has no right to complain that his rights are concluded by it, and if, in such a case, a patent is issued in pursuance of an application regularly made, all persons are concluded. Had the owners of the Mattie L. protested the application for patent of the Anchor, and brought their suit in support of such adverse claim, and the judgment of the court in which the suit was pending had been in favor of the Anchor, this would have been a conclusive determination that the latter is the senior location. Such a judgment of the court would be no more conclusive than the determination by the officers of the land department, in the absence of such protest, that the Anchor was entitled to a patent for all of the territory within its surface boundaries, including the strip covered by both locations. Last Chance Min. Co. v. Tyler Min. Co. 157 U. S. 683, 39 L. ed. 859, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 733; Bunker Hill & S. Min. Concentrating Co. v. Empire State-Idaho Min. & Developing Co. 48 C. C. A. 665, 109 Fed. 538. It may be true, as appellant contends, that, to protect the apex rights of such subsequent locator, no protest is necessary where the junior location is made on the apex of a vein on the dip of which the senior patented location is based, and there is no surface conflict; but in this case the Anchor senior location has a portion of the apex of the same vein, and there was a conflict in the surface between the two locations, and the rule invoked by both parties is applicable to the present case.

Upon the trial, however, appellant, over the objection of appellee, was permitted to go behind the patents to introduce evidence upon the question of the date of the location of the respective claims, since the patents on their face do not disclose the dates of such location, and to rebut this testimony appellee introduced oral testimony. Appellant, therefore, cannot complain if from this showing, as well as from the adjudication of the officers of the land department in granting a patent to the Anchor claim, which we hold conclusive, it appears that the Anchor is the senior location. It was a perfected mining location not later than the 10th of September, 1891, and the Mattie L. does not relate back farther than the 14th of October of the same year, because it did not have a valid discovery until that time, and until after the location of the Anchor was made. It is true that the trial court disregarded all the evidence, documentary and oral, produced at the trial, with respect to the date of location of these claims, except that pertaining to the patents themselves, apparently basing its decision solely upon the effect of the patent proceedings; but if the other evidence admitted, but not considered, is competent or material to the issue of priority, it quite conclusively shows the seniority of the Anchor location. The complaint of appellant that the trial court improperly refused to grant it a new trial on the ground of surprise in the attack made by appellee upon the discovery of the Mattie L., if at all important here, is wholly untenable for the reason that the proof as to the alleged surprise is altogether insufficient under our practice; and, even if appellant were surprised, there is no showing that, in case of a second trial, it would be able to fortify or strengthen its case as made upon the first.

2. The second contention of appellant is that, if the seniority of the Anchor claim be admitted, nevertheless the ore body in dispute belongs to the Mattie L. This is the argument: The discovery vein of the Anchor crosses both end lines of that location. Its dip right thereon is to follow the vein at right angles to the side lines, and its owner may not follow any vein, either discovery or secondary, on the dip at any other angle. Referring again to the diagram, counsel say that the owner of the Anchor may follow the discovery vein, y-z, wherever found within the exterior lines of the survey, and upon its dip between the planes, PQ, being the planes of the end lines, and may follow the secondary vein, a-b, between vertical planes drawn parallel to the planes of the end lines, at the points x and h, where the vein a-b departs from the side lines of the location, and within such planes, represented by the parallelogram, x, c, h, g, may follow the vein, a-b, to its south side line, either on its strike or dip, at any point west of x, but may not follow it east of x, because the apex of the vein, a-b, between x and a, belongs to the owner of the Mattie L. claim, which by its patent has the right to follow such vein on its dip between vertical planes drawn parallel to and coincident with the legal end lines (that is, the located side lines) of the 64 L. R. A.

Mattie L. location, and this includes the vein under the surface of the Anchor within the parallelogram, c, x, e, f.

It is now settled law that the legal end lines of the original or discovery vein are the end lines of all veins within the surface boundaries with respect to extralateral rights. While appellant expressly disclaims that the present case involves the doctrine of extralateral rights, nevertheless in argument its counsel virtually asks to have the principle of that rule applied to the facts. That doctrine does not fit the facts of the case, for the legal question is one strictly of intraliminal rights. Neither can we, by analogy, apply to the facts the principles of that doctrine, as we proceed to show.

The ore bodies in dispute within the parallelogram, c, x, e, f, except the triangle, k, c, n, to which appellant can make no claim, are within the surface lines of the Mattie L., and the entire parallelogram is wholly within the surface lines of the Anchor. The doctrine of extralateral rights refers to that part of a vein which, on the dip, lies outside of the side lines of the location within whose surface lines the apex of the vein appears. and not to any part of such vein, either the outcrop or segments on the dip thereof, which lie wholly within planes drawn downwards coincident with its surface boundaries. In other words, the extralateral rights of a locator of a lode mining claim do not attach until after, in pursuit of his vein on its dip, he crosses the side lines of his location. Here, as we have said, in pursuing the vein, a-b, from its apex, which is within the surface lines of the Mattie L., thence downward on its dip, its owner has encountered a segment thereof inside the side lines, and also the end lines, of the Mattie L., which is also within the surface lines of the senior Anchor location. This segment, too, has a part of the apex of the same vein within the surface boundaries of the Anchor. It will not do to say that such segment is outside of the side lines of the Mattie L., because it is also within the boundaries of the senior Anchor, and, though the Mattie L. does not own the conflicting ground, still this very ground is actually physically within its surface boundaries. The fact that it belongs to another person, and is within the surface boundaries of another location, does not change its position on the ground with reference to legal boundary lines of the respective locations.

To make the point, if possible, still clearer, suppose that the Mattie L. patent had included all the ground which its original survey encompassed. This would embrace the strip in dispute patented by the Anchor. In other words, suppose the Anchor was out of the case entirely, and we were required to ascertain the nature and extent of the rights of the Mattie L. to all the veins found within its surface lines. On the assumption that it has the apex of the vein, a-b, then the rights of the locator are defined by § 2322, U. S. Rev. Stat. (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1425). The property rights conferred by a lode location thereunder are twofold (1 Lindley on Mines, 2d ed. § 549), intraliminal, and extraliminal or extralateral. The first embraces all within its boundaries down to the center of the earth; the second, while depending for its existence upon something within such boundaries, may nevertheless be exercised, under certain conditions, beyond those boundaries. Now, the segment of the vein in dispute here is wholly within the surface lines of the Mattie L. as they were run upon the ground. The property rights of the owner thereto are therefore strictly intraliminal, and in no sense referable to the law governing property rights of the second class. There would seem to be no doubt of this conclusion in the hypothetical case. Instead of the supposed case, however, we have one where two locations cover the same ground, and where the strip common to both is expressly excepted from the Mattie L. patent because it had been previously segregated from the public domain and conveyed by the United States to the owner of the older Anchor location. Neither this exclusion from the Mattie L. patent of the disputed strip, nor the projection of the Anchor into its territory, nor both combined, operate to change the boundary lines of the Mattie L. location. They are still to be traced on the ground as they were first run, and the ground in controversy is just as much within the existing surface lines, both side lines and end lines, of the Mattie L. as when such lines were first laid. Manifestly, therefore, now, as always, whatever property rights, if any, which the owner of the Mattie L. has in the veins found in this particular area, are derived, and must spring, from § 2322 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1425), and that section confers no right whatever if such ground has been previously patented to another.

It is not logical to hold that the extralateral rights with respect to this disputed strip are to be defined as though it was territory beyond the Mattie L. side lines, and within the planes of its end lines, when it so clearly appears that it is wholly within the surface lines of that claim, though covered by a senior conflicting location. The law does not require that the bounding lines of a location be laid wholly upon its own territory, and so as to include only the surface ground actually belonging to it, but they may be laid along or across other and senior locations belonging to another, though, of course, the prior rights of the latter may not thereby be injuriously affected. The courts cannot make a location or change the boundaries as made by the locator himself. But if the Mattie L. was permitted to draw in its boundaries so as to include therein only the ground actually belonging to that location, and so as to exclude all that belonging to the Anchor, the position of the appellant would not be strengthened. On the contrary, it would be left without the vestige of an extralateral right. For then the westerly legal end line (the located westerly side line) of the Mattie L. would be coincident with the northerly side line, the easterly end line, and the southerly side line of the Anchor claim for a certain distance, and thus would be not a straight, but a broken, line, and the westerly end line of the location, as thus laid, would not be parallel with its easterly legal end line, and from a claim thus irregularly located extralateral rights are withheld. The law is that it is the end lines alone, not they and some other lines, which define the extralateral right, and they must be straight lines, not broken or curved ones. Walrath v. Champion Min. Co. 171 U. S. 293, 43 L. ed. 170, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 909.

To hold that the disputed strip is, legally speaking, outside the side lines of the Mattie L. location, would be, not only contrary to the physical fact, but would be putting a premium on an unlawful act. It is clear that, if the locators of the Mattie L. had observed the statute, and not attempted to include within their location previously located ground, and had so drawn its westerly legal end line as to take in only public domain, it would have acquired, by such compliance with the law, no right whatever to the ore bodies now claimed. And while, if the Anchor owner made no objection, the boundary lines of the Mattie L. might be laid on the surface of the Anchor, still the latter's superior right might not thereby be jeopardized. In neither of these cases could extralateral rights be asserted. Can it be said that, because the Mattie L. has so run its surface lines as to include therein property already located by another, it thereby has enlarged its rights beyond what it would have secured had it obeyed the provisions of the statute under which its rights are obtained, and by which they are defined? In other words, may a locator of a mining claim acquire greater rights by disobeying, than by observing, the statutes of the United States, from which all his rights are derived? Until a higher authority so commands, we shall not so decide.

Extralateral rights, as to the ore bodies in dispute, might be exercised if they are outside the side lines of the Mattie L. But this situation can exist only if its westerly legal end line be drawn in to exclude the conflicting territory. In that event, appellant may not go westerly beyond that boundary, for it could not, in pursuing its vein on the dip, pass beyond the planes drawn vertically through the end lines of its location. Such planes would constitute a barrier beyond which the owner of the Mattie L. could not go, and would exclude from the exercise of its extralateral right the easterly portion of the Anchor claim which is here in controversy.

The doctrine of extralateral rights, therefore, does not apply; neither does it by analogy fit this case. The intraliminal rights of the respective parties govern, and since those rights of the junior Mattie L. claim conflict with, and are interrupted by, the senior intraliminal rights of the Anchor, the latter prevails, as we have hereinabove said in discussing another contention of appellant.

Counsel rely chiefly upon Colorado Cent. Consol. Min. Co. v. Turok, 4 C. C. A. 313, 12 U. S. App. 85, 54 Fed. 262, wherein it was said that, where the apex of a vein passes out of the side line of a claim into an adjoining claim, the latter, though junior in date, gives to its owner the right to follow the vein on its dip underneath the senior location. That is the case most nearly in point, but it does not, in our judgment, apply to the facts of this case. Here in the case at bar the segment of the vein claimed by appellant has not on its dip passed out of the side line of the Mattie L. claim, but is wholly within its surface boundaries. In the Turok Case the circuit court of appeals did not deny to a senior location so much of the vein underground as it had the apex of. That decision, as we understand it, so far as it is analogous to this case, was that one who locates upon the apex of a lode may, within planes drawn through the end lines of the location, follow the vein outside of its side lines, and underneath the boundary lines of an adjoining proprietor, when the latter has no part of the apex, though he holds under a senior patent. But here, as we have said, the vein has not on its dip passed beyond the side lines of the junior Mattie L. location, but the ore body in question is wholly within the surface lines of the junior Mattie L., and also inside the surface lines of the senior Anchor, location. Necessarily, therefore, it seems to us that the senior claim has the right to it.

A fundamental error of appellant consists in the attempt to apply the doctrine of extralateral rights to a case which is governed by the law of intraliminal rights; in seeking to apply the limitations which are 64 L. R. A.

applicable to outside parts of veins—that is, veins outside the side lines—to the parts of veins wholly within such lines. This we believe is contrary to § 2322, and opposed to the authorities hereinabove cited. Appellee is not here asserting extralateral rights to the secondary vein, but bases its claims thereto solely on the ground that it is the owner of the senior location, and for that reason owns the ore found within its surface boundaries.

But if the doctrine of extralateral rights does govern, then by the decision in Walrath v. Champion Min. Co., 19 C. C. A. 323, 44 U. S. App. 291, 72 Fed. 978, the end lines, and no other lines, of the Anchor location bound its extralateral rights in the vein, a-b; hence the owner of the Anchor would be entitled to all ores of such vein found within planes drawn downward through its end liens, PQ, and would not be limited, as is attempted to be done here by appellant, by planes drawn parallel to the end lines at the points x and h. This case was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States under the same title (171 U. S. 293, 43 L. ed. 170, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 909), and as to this point was referred to with approval in Montana Min. Co. v. St. Louis Min. & Mill. Co. 42 C. C. A. 415, 102 Fed. 430. We are aware that considerable criticism has been made of this decision. In Ajao Gold Min. Co. v. Hilkey, 31 Colo. 131, 62 L. R. A. 555, 72 Pac. 447, we decided that planes drawn parallel with the end lines, and at points where the vein passed through the side lines of a location, bounded the extralateral rights. We so limited the rule because that was the extent of the claim made by the owner of the extralateral rights. But the Supreme Court of the United States has gone further, and said that these bounding planes must be coincident with the planes of the end lines, and if this case demanded the application of that rule it would be our duty to follow it if we believed the facts of this case are such as to bring it within the principle there announced, notwithstanding the adverse criticism of the decision by the learned author of Lindley on Mines, 2d ed. §§ 593 et seq. Its application would give the ore bodies in dispute here to the Anchor claim as the owner of the senior extralateral right.

Our conclusion is that where there are two conflicting lode locations, each having a portion of the apex of the same vein, and there is a conflict, as here, with respect to the dip rights within the surface lines of the two locations, the senior location must prevail.

To avoid, if possible, misunderstanding, we further observe that in this case a portion of the secondary vein, a-b, is within the surface boundaries of the senior Anchor lode, as the stipulated facts show. The owner of that claim, to say the least, certainly owns all the mineral of such vein within planes extended vertically downwards coincident with its end lines and side lines to the extent at least, of the length of the apex found within its surface boundaries. The case has not been argued, certainly not exclusively, upon the proposition that each of these parties owns a definite portion of the ore found within the parallelogram, c, f, e, x, to each belonging such part of the vein as it has the apex of, but, if it had been, there are not sufficient data in the record to show what portion, or how much, each party is entitled to, even if we should hold that the Mattie L. owns such portion of the ores within that parallelogram as it has the apex of easterly of x. The case has been submitted rather upon the proposition that each party owns all the ores found within this parallelogram.

In thus disposing of this action, we have not overlooked, though we do not pass upon, the contention of appellee that the Mattie L. can, in no circumstances, have any right, intraliminal or extralateral, to the secondary vein, a-b, because it is substantially parallel with the discovery vein, and more than 300 feet distant therefrom, and under § 2320 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1424) such other vein is, therefore, excluded from the operation of the patent, though it may be within the surface lines of the claim as surveyed and located on the ground. There are other contentions by appellee which, in the view we have taken of the case, are not discussed.

In addition to the authorities already cited, we refer to the following, among others, which in principle uphold the conclusions here reached: Iron Silver Min. Co. v. Elgin Min. & Smelting Co. 118 U. S. 196, 30 L. ed. 98, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1177; Del Monte Min. & Mill. Co. v. Last Chance Min. & Mill. Co. 171 U. S. 55, 43 L. ed. 72, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 895.

The judgment of the District Court being in accordance with our conclusion, it is affirmed.

Rehearing denied March 7, 1904.

(.....Ga.)

*1. The manufacturer of a buggy, who sells it to a municipal corporation for the use of one of its employees, representing it to be strong and in good condition, but knowing that it is in fact defective, the defect being so concealed by the use of paint and grease that the purchaser cannot detect it, is liable in damages to the person whose use of the buggy was contemplated at the time of the sale for injuries caused by such defect; and this is so notwithstanding there was no privity of contract between the plaintiff and the defendant in the sale of the buggy.

2. The amendments which were allowed merely amplified the original petition, and were not open to the objection that they set out a new cause of action.

Mr. Reuben R. Arnold, for plaintiff:

The warranty being an undertaking or contract on the part of the vendor, the vendee is entitled to recover such damages as are sustained by him as a direct consequence of the breach of such contract. Macon v. Dykes, 103 Ga. 847, 31 S. E. 443.

Candler, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The main bill of exceptions assigns error upon the sustaining of a general demurrer to the plaintiff's petition. The defendants filed a cross bill complaining of the allowance of an amendment to the petition. The case made by the declaration was, in substance, as follows: The plaintiff is superintendent of the waterworks department of the city of Atlanta, and in the performance of his duties has occasion to ride between different points in the city. The defendants are manufacturers and sellers of buggies, carriages, and other vehicles. On July 30, 1901, the plaintiff, in behalf of the city of Atlanta, bought of the defendants a buggy for his use, the defendants at the time representing to him that the buggy was in good condition, extra strong, and fitted for the service for which it was intended. After purchasing the buggy, the plaintiff began to use it, and on or about November 12, 1901, while riding in it on the streets of Atlanta, "the spindle extending from the right front axle broke, the buggy was wrecked and turned over, causing the horse to run away, and plaintiff was thrown about and around and on the Belgian block pavement, and greatly and permanently injured." The defendants were lacking in ordinary care in the manufacture, inspection, sale, and handling of the buggy. An ordinary test would have led to the discovery of the defect which caused the spindle to break. "There was a large crack in said axle, but the defendants had caused and directed the same to be covered with grease, and the crack filled in. This crack extended through the larger part of the spindle, and so weakened the same that the weight of the buggy caused the same to break. The crack was visible to the defendants, in the exercise of ordinary care, before they placed the grease upon the spindle, and, had the defendants exercised ordinary care in sounding and testing the buggy in any way, they would have discovered the break or crack." On account of the crack being filled and covered with grease, the plaintiff could not, in the exercise of ordinary care, discover its existence, and was unaware of it. The defendants falsely represented to the plaintiff that the buggy was in good condition, knowing at the time that the representation was false. The plaintiff's injuries were described, and were alleged to be permanent. Two amendments to the petition were offered, and were allowed over the defendants' objection. The first alleged that the spindle which broke was made of "defective, cheap, imperfect, and improperly welded iron and steel, . . . and flaws and incipient cracks were present in it." The second set up that at the time of his injuries the plaintiff was in the discharge of his duties as superintendent of the waterworks system of Atlanta; that the defendants, who reside in Atlanta, knew at and prior to the time the buggy was sold that it was to be used by the plaintiff in the discharge of his duties, and sold the buggy expressly for such use; and that the plaintiff was injured by being thrown out into the street by the giving way and breaking of the axle, which caused the buggy to drop to the ground. "He was not hurt by the horse running away. The horse ran away after the buggy fell, and after plaintiff was injured."

1. We do not hesitate to hold that the petition set out a cause of action. Independently of the question of liability to the plaintiff on the alleged warranty of the buggy, we are clear that under the allegations the defendants were guilty of a tort for which the plaintiff could hold them liable. The gist of the action is the alleged false representation, knowingly made, as to the quality and condition of the buggy. In this it is very similar to an action of deceit. It makes no difference that there was no privity of contract between the parties. It appears that the plaintiff's injuries were sustained while the buggy was being put to a use expressly contemplated by the parties when the sale was made. "A particular transaction may sometimes be looked upon 64 L. R. A.

as affording the right to bring an action either for the breach of contract or in tort. Take, for instance, the too familiar case of a railway disaster caused by the company's negligence. The company is liable to the passenger in contract because it gave him a ticket, and in tort because it was not sufficiently careful in carrying him. In such a case as this there is clearly direct privity between the plaintiff and the defendant. But, generally speaking, privity is not necessary to support an action in tort. . . . If a railway company contract with a master to carry his servant, and in doing so is guilty of negligence, which causes bodily hurt to the servant and consequent damage by loss of service to the master, the company may be sued in contract by the master and in tort by the servant." Note to Landridge v. Levy, 4 Mees. & W. 337; Shirley, L. C. 346. In that case, which is closely in point in the present discussion, a father bought from a gunsmith a gun, which was warranted, telling the gunsmith at the time of the purchase that he wanted the gun for the use of himself and his sons. The gun, while being used by one of the sons, exploded, injuring him, and suit was brought by him against the seller of the gun for the tort. The defendant contended that the right of action, if any, was in the father, to whom the sale had been made; but it was held that the suit in tort could be maintained by the son. In the able and exhaustive brief of counsel for the plaintiff a large number of cases of similar import are cited, but for the purposes of the present discussion we deem it necessary to refer to only a few of those most closely in point. In Lewis v. Terry, 111 Cal. 39, 31 L. R. A. 220, 52 Am. St. Rep. 146, 43 Pac. 398, it was held that "one who sells a folding bed, representing it to be safe for use, when he knows it to be dangerous, is liable for injuries caused by the defects in the bed to any person who uses it, although there may be no privity of contract between them." That decision was based on the principle that the defendant was guilty of a wrong independently of his contract, viz., his false representation as to the safety of the bed, and that thereby the case was brought within the operation of the law of torts. In Schubert v. J. R. Clark Co. 49 Minn. 331, 15 L. R. A. 818, 32 Am. St. Rep. 559, 51 N. W. 1103, the plaintiff was a painter in the employment of a contractor. The contractor ordered of a retail merchant a stepladder for the use of the plaintiff. The merchant, not having such a ladder in his stock, ordered the defendant, a manufacturer, to deliver one to the place designated by the contractor. The ladder so delivered was made of defective and inferior material, and was dangerous, but its defects were hidden from view by paint, varnish, and oil. By reason of its weakness the plaintiff fell from it and was injured. The court held the defendant "liable for injuries caused by such negligence to one into whose hands the dangerous implement comes for use in the usual course of business, even though there be no contract relation between the latter and the manufacturer." We have been able to find in our own Reports only one case at all in point in the present discussion. In Blood Balm Co. v. Cooper, 83 Ga. 457, 5 L. R. A. 612, 20 Am. St. Rep. 324, 10 S. E. 118, this court held: "Where one prepares a proprietary or patent medicine, and puts it upon the market, and recommends it to the world as useful for the cure of certain diseases, the bottle containing it having therewith a prescription, made by the proprietor of the medicine, in which he states that it is to be taken in certain quantities, and the medicine with this prescription is sold by the proprietor to a druggist for the purpose of being resold to persons who might wish to use it, and the druggist sells the same to a person, who uses it in the quantity thus prescribed, and the same contains an ingredient such as iodide of potash in such quantities as proves harmful to the person thus using it, the proprietor is liable." We recognize that there is some distinction between the case cited and the case now under consideration, but it seems clear that the same principle of law is applicable in both. Many courts have laid down a different rule governing the sale of articles which are inherently dangerous, such as a deadly poison or a powerful explosive, from that which is applied to the sale of ordinary articles of commerce; holding that the negligent sale, shipment, or handling of such inherently dangerous articles will render the negligent person liable to anyone who may be injured by reason of his negligence, regardless of the question of privity between them, while as to articles not inherently dangerous there must be some privity between the parties to give a right of action. This rule, however, can have no application to the present case in view of the fact that the petition distinctly alleges that the plaintiff's use of the buggy was contemplated by the defendants when the sale was made, that they knew of the defects in the spindle, and that they concealed this defect from him by the use of paint and grease, and represented to him that the buggy was in perfect condition. The case of Cobb v. O. Everett Clark Co. 118 Ga. 493, 45 S. E. 305, cited in the brief of counsel for the defendants, has no bearing upon the case now under discussion. There the plaintiff entered into a written contract with a building company, which was erecting a building adjoining his premises, concerning the building of a party wall between the two buildings. The defendant, a contractor for the building company, was not a party to this contract. The suit was brought against it for alleged negligence in the erection of the wall for the building company. This court held, necessarily, that whatever duty was owed to the plaintiff in the construction of the wall was by the building company, with which he had a written contract on the subject; that the defendant owed the plaintiff no duty, and was not liable to him in damages.

2. There was no error in allowing the amendments to the petition. These amendments merely amplified the original petition, and set out more in detail the nature of the alleged defects in the buggy and the circumstances of the plaintiff's injury. By no construction can they be held to introduce a new cause of action.

Judgment reversed.

CROSS-APPEALS from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Elkhart County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover back premiums paid upon a void policy of life insurance; the defendant appealing from so much of the decree as permitted a recovery, and plaintiff appealing from so much as applied the statute of limitations to a portion of the demand. Reversed on plaintiff's appeal.

Stiles had no insurable interest in the life of Mary Ellsworth, and so, on the ground of public policy, the policy of insurance issued to him was void from the beginning.

Dowling, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought by the appellee to recover from the appellant premiums paid for insurance upon a policy alleged to have been void from the time of its execution. At the request of the parties the court made a special finding of facts, and stated its conclusions of law thereon. Exceptions were saved by both parties, and judgment was rendered for the appellee for so much of the premiums as was paid by her within six years before the commencement of the action. Errors are assigned by the appellant upon each conclusion of law. The appellee assigns a cross-error upon the second conclusion.

Briefly stated, the facts were as follows: The appellant was a mutual life insurance company organized under the laws of this state, doing business on the assessment plan. On February 24, 1887, at the city of Elkhart, with full knowledge of the facts, it issued its policy of insurance to one Leander Stiles upon the life of one Mary Ellsworth, a resident of New York, without her knowledge. Stiles was not a creditor of Mrs. Ellsworth, nor was she under any kind of obligation, legal or moral, to him. She was related to him only as an aunt by marriage, and he was in no way dependent upon her. The consideration of the policy was the payment by Stiles of a membership fee of $25, and his agreement to make monthly payments of $6.80. The sum to be paid to Stiles, his heirs, administrators, or assigns, within thirty days after the death of Mrs. Ellsworth, and proof thereof, was his pro rata share of 80 per cent of an assessment on all members of the insurance company,—not exceeding, however, $4,000. Stiles paid the membership fee and the assessments for February and March, 1887. On March 2, 1887, in consideration of the agreement of the appellee to pay all subsequent premiums and assessments on the policy, he assigned to her a two-thirds interest in it. After such assignment the assessments were increased by appellant to $12 per month. The appellee paid all such premiums and assessments until October, 1890, when the appellant refused to receive any further payments, for the reason, as it alleged, that the policy had lapsed in consequence of the failure of the appellee to pay the October, 1890, assessment on the day it became due. Mrs. Ellsworth died in May, 1900, and, when payment of the amount named in the policy was demanded by the appellee, the appellant at first refused to pay it because the policy had lapsed on the nonpayment of the October, 1890, assessment; but afterwards, on June 13, 1900, it denied its liability on the ground that neither Stiles, who took out the policy, nor the appellee, to whom it was assigned, had an insurable interest in the life of Mrs. Ellsworth. The application for the policy was made by Stiles through one Gusten, an agent of the appellant. Gusten knew that the application was made without the knowledge or consent of Mrs. Ellsworth; that Stiles was not a creditor of Mrs. Ellsworth; that she was not obligated to him in any manner; that Stiles was not dependent upon her in any way; that she was an aunt of the said Stiles by marriage only, and not otherwise related to him. The application was written by Gusten himself, and Stiles signed Mrs. Ellsworth's name to it in the presence of Gusten. The latter forwarded the application to the appellant, at Elkhart, Indiana, and on February 24, 1887, the appellant, on this application, issued to Stiles the policy on the life of Mrs. Ellsworth. At the time of the assignment of the policy to the appellee and prior thereto, Gusten, who was acting as the agent for the appellant, and who knew all the facts before stated, for the purpose of inducing the appellee to take an assignment of the policy, falsely and fraudulently represented to her that the policy was valid and all right; that she had a right to take an assignment thereof; that she would be entitled to receive payment thereunder in case of loss; that it was a good investment for her, and one by which she might save her money. The appellee was ignorant of all the facts of the case, and of the law in respect to them. She believed and relied on the representations of Gusten, the agent of the company, and was induced by them to take an assignment of the policy, and to pay to Stiles therefor all he had paid out thereon, including the membership fee and the said monthly assessments. She continued to pay the assessments thereafter, under the belief that the policy was valid. Some two months after the policy was assigned to her, Barney, the vice president and treasurer of the appellant, visited the appellee at her home, in Valparaiso, and she repeated to him all that Gusten had said to her in regard to the assignment of the policy. Barney thereupon, with full knowledge of all that had taken place, represented to her that everything was perfectly right, and advised her to keep her dues paid. The appellee thereafter, relying on these false representations and statements of Barney and Gusten, as agents of the appellant, continued to pay the monthly assessments on the policy until October, 1897. A few days after it became due, she tendered the October assessment, and from month to month thereafter she offered to pay each subsequent assessment, but her tenders and offers were refused. The total amount paid by the appellee on account of premiums and assessments was $1,574, which, with the interest thereon, amounted to $2,586.35. Before the commencement of the suit, the appellee demanded repayment to her of the amount so paid on account of the policy, but the appellant refused to repay the same, or any part of it. The action was commenced November 10, 1900.

The court's conclusions of law were, "(1) that the said policy was void from the beginning; (2) that plaintiff is entitled to recover all moneys paid by her, with interest, within six years before the commencement of this action, being the sum of $1,007.35."

A reversal of the judgment is insisted upon by the appellant on the grounds, (1) that the finding fails to show that the policy was issued without the knowledge or consent of Mary Ellsworth; (2) that it does not appear that the policy was invalid under § 6 of the act of March 9, 1883 (Acts 1883, chap. 136, p. 204), either in the hands of Stiles or the appellee; (3) that public policy forbids a recovery by the appellee; (4) that the appellee can found no right upon a misrepresentation of the law; and (5) that the appellee has no superior equity against the other members of the appellant, as a mutual life insurance company.

Section 6 of the act of March 9, 1883 (Acts 1883, chap. 136, p. 204), under which the appellant company was organized, declared that when payments of assessments on a policy were made by any person other than the insured, and without his written consent, the beneficiary must have an insurable interest in the life assured. Section 9 of the act made it a felony for any person to knowingly secure a policy on the life of another without his knowledge or consent. Stiles had no insurable interest in the life of Mrs. Ellsworth. All assessments were to be paid by him, and the policy was issued to him without her knowledge or consent. The contract of insurance, therefore, was void, both as against public policy, and by force of the statute. Continental L. Ins. Co. v. Volger, 89 Ind. 572, 575, 46 Am. Rep. 185; Prudential Ins. Co. v. Hunn, 21 Ind. App. 525, 69 Am. St. Rep. 380, 52 N. E. 772; Russ v. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. 23 N. Y. 516; May, Ins. 4th ed. § 74; Beach, Ins. § 850.

The question, then, is, Had the appellee, as the assignee of the policy, under the circumstances hereinbefore stated, the right to recover the premiums and assessments paid by her on account of the supposed insurance? The general rule is that an action will not lie to recover premiums paid upon an insurance which is illegal by reason of the policy being illegal by statute, or by reason of the illegality of the adventure insured. Lowry v. Bourdieu, 2 Dougl. K. B. 468, 14 English Ruling Cases, 533; Van Dyck v. Hewitt, 1 East, 96, 5 Revised Rep. 516; Russell v. De Grand, 15 Mass. 35; Welsh v. Cutler, 44 N. H. 561; Feise v. Parkinson, 4 Taunt. 640, 13 Revised Rep. 710; Anderson v. Thornton, 8 Exch. 425; Waller v. Northern Assur. Co. 64 Iowa, 101, 19 N. W. 865; Richards v. Marine Ins. Co. 3 Johns. 307; New York L. Ins. Co. v. Fletcher, 117 U. S. 519, 29 L. ed. 934, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 837. But it is held that this rule does not apply where there has been no fraud on the part of the plaintiff, where the policy is void because of innocent misrepresentations, where the plaintiff has been induced to take out the policy by the fraud of the insurer, and is himself innocent, or where it is clear that the policy was not a wagering contract, but was taken out under a mistake in regard to the rights of the party insured. In this case it is to be borne in mind that the appellee herself did not take out the policy, but that, with the knowledge and consent of the appellant, and at its solicitation, she took an assignment of it. Upon the authority of Continental Ins. Co. v. Munns, 120 Ind. 30, 5 L. R. A. 430, 22 N. E. 78, the assignment is to be treated as a new contract, to which the assignee and the insurer are the parties. In Lowry v. Bourdieu, 2 Dougl. K. B. 472, the right to recover the premium paid upon a gaming policy issued in violation of an act of Parliament was denied; but Lord Mansfield said "he desired it might not be understood that the court held that, in all cases where money has been paid on an illegal consideration, it cannot be recovered back; that in cases of oppression—when paid, for instance, to a creditor to induce him to sign a bankrupt's certificate, or upon a usurious contract—it may be recovered, for in such cases the parties are not in pari delicto." In Fulton v.

Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 47 N. Y. S. R. 111, 19 N. Y. Supp. 660, the plaintiff, being solicited for life insurance by defendant's agent, took out policies on the life of her sister and brother, payable to herself; having signed their names to the application with the knowledge of the agent. After several years, she ascertained that the policies were void on that account, and brought an action to recover the premiums paid. It was held that the company was chargeable with the agent's knowledge of the invalidity of the policies and that the plaintiff was entitled to recover, though the facts were never communicated to the company. In Waller v. Northern Assur. Co. 64 Iowa, 101, 19 N. W. 865, two policies of fire insurance were issued to the plaintiff as the absolute owner of the property insured, when he really held but a mortgage interest in it. No actual fraud was found in the representations concerning the title. The policies contained the condition that, "if the interest of the assured in the property be any other than the entire, unconditional and sole ownership of the property, for the use and benefit of the assured, . . . it must be so represented to these companies, and so expressed in the written part of this policy, otherwise, the policy shall be void." The court said: "Under this condition, each of the policies was absolutely void, and incapable of binding or being enforced against defendants. . . . Each presents the case of a payment of money by plaintiff, and a failure to receive any consideration therefor, without any fraud or deception practised by him. It is the simple case of money paid in good faith, and nothing in return received. No element of fraud exists which defeats plaintiff's rights. Nor is it a case of voluntary payment, for it was made with the expectation of receiving a consideration in return which has wholly failed, for the reason that the policy did not bind defendants. Under familiar rules of the law, plaintiff is entitled to recover the amount of premiums paid, as money had and received to his use. This doctrine has been often recognized by the authorities as applicable in actions for the recovery of money paid as premiums upon policies when the risk did not attach, or the contract was void ab initio." The facts in Fisher v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 160 Mass. 386, 39 Am. St. Rep. 495, 35 N. E. 849, were these: An agent of the defendant solicited the plaintiff's husband to effect an insurance on his life for the wife's benefit, which the husband refused to do. Afterwards the agent, without the knowledge of the husband, urged the wife to effect such insurance, and procured a physician to visit and converse with the husband, and thereafter to sign the requisite examination. The husband was not aware of the purpose of the physician in visiting him, nor did he know that any application had been made for insurance on his life. The wife signed her name and that of her husband to the application for insurance, and also to the examination form on the back of the application. The agent afterwards delivered to the wife a policy of insurance upon the life of her husband, payable to her in the event of his death, and the wife paid the premiums then and thereafter falling due for such insurance. The agent also delivered to the wife a book upon which receipts of money paid by her were, from time to time, acknowledged, and the book contained extracts from the rules and regulations of the company to which the policy was subject. Among others was a rule stating that under no circumstances could an application be written upon the life of a husband for the benefit of his wife without his consent, nor without an examination by the physician of the company, nor unless the applicant personally signed the examination form on the back of the application after the answers to the application had been made, and that any policy issued in violation of these rules should be void. In July, 1892, the wife claimed that she was first advised of the invalidity of the policy for want of the consent of her husband. She informed the president of the company by letter of that date that she had discovered that the policy had been issued against the rules of the company, and was not enforceable, and that the agent had told her at the time it was issued it was all right. She therefore stated that she wished her money back. The company did not make any direct reply to the letter, but afterwards one of its agents urged the wife to continue her payments, which she refused to do, and again demanded repayment of the money paid by her as premiums, which demand being refused, she brought her action. In ruling upon an exception to an instruction given to the jury, the court said: "If the plaintiff, in collusion with Bannigan, the defendant's agent, intended to cheat the company or practise a fraud upon it, then the money she has paid the company was paid in pursuance of this fraudulent intention, and she cannot recover it back; but, if she was innocent of any fraudulent intent, and was deceived by Bannigan, and induced by his fraudulent representations to make the application, then she could rescind the contract of insurance when she discovered the fraud, and recover back the amount of the premiums which she had paid. Hedden v. Griffin, 136 Mass. 229, 49 Am. Rep. 25." In Bales v. Hunt, 77 Ind. 355, this court held that while, ordinarily, relief against mistakes of law will not be afforded, yet, where the mistake was induced or encouraged by the misrepresentations of the other party to the transaction, and the plaintiff, through misapprehension or mistake of law, assumes obligations or gives up a private right of property upon grounds upon which he would not have acted but for such misapprehension, a court of equity may grant relief, if, under the general circumstances of the case, it is satisfied that the party benefited by the mistake cannot, in conscience, retain the benefit or advantage so acquired. See also Kerr, Fraud & Mistake, pp. 398, 400; Hollingsworth v. Stone, 90 Ind. 244; Kinney v. Dodge, 101 Ind. 573; Parish v. Camplin, 139 Ind. 14, 37 N. E. 607; Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. v. Bowser, 20 Ind. App. 557, 50 N. E. 86; Supreme Lodge, K. of H. v. Metcalf, 15 Ind. App. 135, 43 N. E. 893.

If the contract of insurance be illegal in its inception, the insured cannot recover the premiums paid, if the parties are in pari delicto. The controlling inquiry, then, in the present case, is, Were the parties to the transaction equally in fault? It was said by Lord Mansfield in Browning v. Morris, 2 Cowp. 790, 793, that "the rule is, In pari delicto potior est conditio defendentis, and there are several other maxims of the same kind. Where the contract is executed and the money paid in pari delicto, this rule, as Mr. Dunning contended, certainly holds, and the party who has paid it cannot recover it back. For instance, in bribery, if a man pays a sum of money by way of a bribe, he can never recover it in an action, because both plaintiff and defendant are equally criminal. But where contracts or transactions are prohibited by positive statute, for the sake of protecting one set of men from another set of men, the one, from their situation and condition, being liable to be oppressed or imposed upon by the other,—there the parties are not in pari delicto; and, in furtherance of these statutes, the person injured, after the transaction is finished and completed, may bring his action and defeat the contract." The rule is thus stated in 20 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 816: "It is one of the fundamental maxims of the common law that ignorance of law excuses no one. It is a maxim founded, not only on expediency and policy, but on necessity. . . . It is therefore applied most rigidly at law, and is only relaxed in equity where the mistake is mixed with misrepresentation or fraud, or where the ignorance of the complainant has conferred upon the defendant a benefit which he cannot in good conscience retain." The language used by the court in Jestons v. Brooke 2 Cowp. 793, 795, is directly applicable to 64 L. R. A.

the case under consideration: "This is an action for money had and received, and therefore it is analogous to a bill in equity. The ground of the action is to recover half of the net profits arising by the resale of certain goods purchased by the defendant, as stated in the report. The general question is 'whether the plaintiff ought to recover in an action for money had and received?' that is, 'whether it is against conscience that the defendant should retain the whole profits of the goods in question to himself.'"

The present suit is not brought to enforce the illegal contract of insurance, or any right arising out of it. The appellee seeks only to recover from the appellant moneys paid by her to it without any consideration whatever. For, as the policy on the life of Mrs. Ellsworth was void from its inception, the appellant never incurred any risk, and the appellee never could have derived any benefit from it. At the time of the assignment of the policy, and immediately previous thereto, Gusten, acting as the agent of the appellant, and knowing all the facts which rendered the policy void, for the purpose of inducing the appellee to take an assignment of the policy, falsely and fraudulently represented to her that the policy was valid, that she would be entitled to recover payment thereunder in case of loss, and that the assignment would be a good investment for her. The appellee, who was a woman, believed these representations, and was induced by them to take an assignment of the policy from Stiles, and to reimburse him for his entire outlay up to that time. She also agreed to pay all future premiums and assessments. Within two months after the assignment was made, and when she had paid a comparatively small amount on the policy, Barney, the vice president and treasurer of the appellant, acting for it, visited the appellee at her home, and, when told by her what Gusten had said to her, with a full knowledge of the facts, also falsely represented to the appellee that the policy was perfectly right, and advised her to go on and keep her dues paid up. Relying on these false statements, the appellee paid to the appellant premiums and assessments on the void policy to the amount of $1,574. It cannot be said that the parties to this transaction were in pari delicto, or that the appellant ought, in good conscience, to retain the moneys paid to it by the appellee. The representations made to the appellee by the officers and agents of the company—one of them being its vice president and treasurer—were calculated to impose upon and mislead anyone contemplating the purchase of a policy previously issued by the company.

The parties did not stand upon an equal footing, and the officers and agents making the false representations to the appellee had every advantage over her which their special knowledge of the facts of the case, and of the law of insurance applicable to their company, could give. We think, too, that these representations that the policy was valid and would be paid were equivalent to a statement that it had been issued with the knowledge and consent of Mrs. Ellsworth, and that Stiles had such an interest in her life, as creditor or otherwise, as authorized him to take it out, so that the mistake of the appellee, occasioned by the fraudulent representations of the appellant's officers and agents, may be fairly regarded a mistake of fact as well as of law. The direct result of this mistake was that the appellee assumed obligations to pay the premiums and assessments on the policy, and that she parted with her money in discharging them.

In this connection, the fact is not to be overlooked that § 9 of the act of 1883 makes it a criminal offense for any person to secure a policy on the life of another without his knowledge or consent only when such act is done knowingly. The court expressly found that, in taking the assignment of the policy, the appellee was ignorant of the facts which rendered it void.

Our conclusion upon this branch of the case is that the appellant cannot, in good conscience, be permitted to retain the premiums and assessments paid to it by the appellee, and that she has the right to recover the same in this action.

A distinction between a mistake of law, affecting mere private rights, and such a mistake when the transaction is illegal by statute or is against public policy, may exist, as contended for by counsel for appellant; but, giving to this distinction its fullest effect, it could not, under the circumstances of this case, as shown by the special finding, defeat the appellee's right to recover the premiums and assessments paid by her. She did not take out the policy. She violated no statute. She knowingly did no act prohibited by law or by public policy. She has not attempted to enforce the illegal contract, or make any claim under it. She admits that she has no claim against the appellant upon the policy. While she must give up the insurance upon the life of Mrs. Ellsworth, because the contract was void, it is equally necessary that the appellant should surrender the money it has received from her without right, without consideration, and solely through the fraudulent misrepresentations of its officers.

The point that the appellee has no equity which is superior to that of the members of the appellant association is without merit, and requires no consideration. The corporation received the money, and should repay it.

The trial court found that $1,574 had been paid by the appellee on account of premiums and assessments, and that the interest thereon amounted to $1,012.35, making a total of $2,586.35, but that the appellee was entitled to recover only the moneys paid by her within six years before the commencement of the action, with interest thereon. The cross-error assigned by the appellee calls in question the correctness of the conclusion limiting the appellee's right of recovery to the sums paid by her within six years before the commencement of the action, and we are asked to grant her affirmative relief, by requiring a restatement of this conclusion of law. It is well settled that this court has the right to grant such relief to the appellee, even where the judgment is not reversed. In discussing the subject of the assignment of cross-errors by the appellee, this court said in Feder v. Field, 117 Ind. 386, 388, 20 N. E. 129: "The rule [allowing the assignment of cross-errors] which has so long prevailed, and which we here sanction and carry to its just and logical result, does no injustice to any party. It prevents a multiplicity of appeals, and yet presents for adjudication the rights of all the parties properly brought before the court. It enables the court to finally adjudicate upon the whole controversy. It prevents one party from taking an advantage of the other by appealing, and, after the assignment of cross-errors, dismissing the appeal and carrying the entire case out of court. It brings the practice on appeal into harmony with the practice in the trial courts, and gives uniformity and consistency to our system of procedure. It simplifies the practice, and yet preserves all rights. In deciding that cross-errors may be assigned, we do not by any means decide that it is necessary to consider them in every instance. Nor do we decide that they are always, or even generally, of controlling effect. If, for instance, all that the appellee asks is an affirmance of the judgment, then all that it is necessary to do, in cases where an affirmance can be reached by disposing of the errors assigned by the appellant, is simply to consider and decide the questions presented by the appellant's assignment. It is not every case where cross-errors will entitle the appellee to affirmative relief, for in many cases they can do no more than prevent a reversal or settle a question of costs. Where, however, the entire record and all the parties are properly before the court on appeal, and it is manifest from the record before the court that the appellee has not received the relief to which he was entitled, this court may direct that it be awarded him. . . . With such a record before us, all questions should be decided, for otherwise the assignment of cross-errors would be an idle ceremony." Patoka Twp. v. Hopkins, 131 Ind. 142, 31 Am. St. Rep. 417, 30 N. E. 896; Johnson v. Outcser, 116 Ind. 278, 19 N. E. 129; Thomas v. Simmons, 103 Ind. 538, 547, 2 N. E. 203, 3 N. E. 381; 2 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 970. The money received by the appellant from the appellee on account of premiums and assessments on the policy was so received, with the knowledge and consent of the appellee, to be applied in discharge of supposed obligations arising out of the transaction between the parties. Until the discovery by the appellee that the policy was void, and her rescission of it, the moneys so paid were held by the appellant, with her apparent consent as its own. Under the particular circumstances of this case, we think a demand was necessary before bringing the action. The statute of limitations did not begin to run until such demand was made, or until the disavowal of the contract by the appellant. Then, too, the contract on the part of the appellant was wholly executory, and on the part of the appellee it was a continuous one. Taggart v. Tevanny, 1 Ind. App. 339, 357, 27 N. E. 511; Littler v. Smiley, 9 Ind. 116; Purviance v. Purviance, 14 Ind. App. 269, 272, 42 N. E. 364. Until June 13, 1900, both the appellant and the appellee treated the contract of insurance as a valid one, and acted under it. We think it clear that the statute did not begin to run against the claim of the appellee until June 13, 1900.

The trial court allowed interest upon the claim of the appellee from the date of the payment of the several premiums. We find no authority for this action of the court, and we have been referred to none. The provision of the statute on this subject is that interest shall be allowed on money had and received for the use of another, and retained without his consent. Burns's Rev. Stat. 1901, § 7045. According to our view of the case, interest should be calculated on the sum of the premiums and assessments paid by the appellee to the appellant only from the date of the demand made by her for their repayment. Stanley v. Penoe, 160 Ind. 636, 66 N. E. 51, 67 N. E. 441.

Judgment reversed on cross-error, and the Elkhart Circuit Court is directed to restate its second conclusion of law in conformity to this opinion, and to render judgment in favor of the appellee and against the appellant for the amount due.

William POTTER, Appt.,
v.

STATE of Indiana.

(.....Ind.....)

The death of one of the participants in a friendly scuffle through the accidental discharge of a pistol carried in the pocket of the other contrary to the provisions of the statute cannot be said to be caused by the performance of a wrongful act, so as to render the one carrying the pistol guilty of manslaughter, under the provisions of a statute that whoever unlawfully kills a human being involuntarily, but in the commission of some unlawful act, is guilty of that crime.

(February 23, 1904.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Criminal Court for Marion County convicting him of manslaughter. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. W. E. Henderson and M. L. Clawson, for appellant:

The mere fact of carrying a concealed weapon, coupled with the death from its discharge, does not constitute involuntary manslaughter. There must be some overt act in connection with the weapon.

Com. v. Adams, 114 Mass. 323, 19 Am. Rep. 362; People v. Pearne, 118 Cal. 154, 50 Pac. 376; Rea v. Franklin, 15 Cox, C. C. 163.

It is not true that, if one is killed by another who is engaged in the commission of an unlawful act, and the killing is accidental, he is liable for manslaughter, when there was no act of his showing any disregard for the rights of the decedent.

Messrs. William C. Geake, Cassius C. Hadley, and Leopold G. Rothschild, with Mr. Charles W. Miller, Attorney General, for the State:

A death resulting inadvertently from the commission of any misdemeanor will ordinarily constitute manslaughter. Some of the authorities have imposed the qualification that the unlawful act causing death must be malum in se, and not merely malum prohibitum; but this is not a distinction of much practical importance, for an act not wrong in itself will seldom, if ever, be the efficient cause of death.

Harvey v. State, 40 Ind. 516; Kelley v. State, 53 Ind. 311.

Jordan, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant was tried before a jury in the lower court, and a verdict was returned finding him "guilty of manslaughter, as charged in the indictment." Over his motion for a new trial, the court rendered judgment on the verdict, assessing his punishment at imprisonment in the Indiana reformatory for not less than two nor more than twenty-one years, and that he be fined and disfranchised. From this judgment he appeals, and assigns, among others, that the court erred in overruling his motion for a new trial.

The indictment upon which he was tried and convicted charged that William Potter on the 10th day of April, 1903, at the county of Marion, state of Indiana, "did then and there unlawfully, feloniously, and involuntarily, without malice, express or implied, kill one Hurva Garnett, by then and there, in a rude, insolent, and angry manner, unlawfully and feloniously shooting at and against and into the body of the said Hurva Garnett with a certain revolver, a dangerous weapon, which he, the said William Potter, then and there unlawfully had, loaded with gunpowder and leaden balls, concealed upon his person, he, the said William Potter, not then and there being a traveler, thereby mortally wounding the said Hurva Garnett, from which mortal wound he, the said Hurva Garnett, then and there died, contrary to the form of the statute," etc. The undisputed facts established by the evidence are substantially as follows: Appellant, a young colored man, about twenty-four years old, residing in the city of Indianapolis, was on the day of the homicide, which is shown to have been on some Sunday in the month of April, 1903, going to his home, in said city. As he was passing along the street near the corner of Rhode Island and Locke streets, the deceased, a boy about eighteen years old, together with some two other boys, was standing at the corner of said streets. Appellant and the deceased, as it appears, were friends, and well acquainted with each other, and at times past had been in the habit of engaging in "friendly scuffles." As appellant approached the corner of the streets in question, he was engaged in tossing up a small ball; and, when he came up to the point where the deceased was standing, some friendly conversation or bantering occurred between them, in regard as to whether appellant could hit him with the ball which he had been tossing. The talk or bantering between the parties in question appears to have led up to a friendly play or "scuffle," during which a loaded revolver that appellant at the time was carrying concealed in his pocket, or somewhere about his person, was accidentally discharged; the ball therefrom passing through the clothing of appellant into the body of the deceased, from the effects of which the latter died.

Counsel for appellant contend that the verdict of the jury is contrary both to law and the evidence, and that the conviction of the accused cannot, thereunder, be sustained. Counsel for the state say in their brief: "This record presents a case which is somewhat novel in the annals of criminal jurisprudence in this state, if not in this country. The manner in which the deceased met his death, as shown by the record, was peculiar, to say the least; and whether appellant must suffer for the crime of involuntary manslaughter for circumstances created unintentionally, nevertheless unlawful, on his part, is the question presented for this court's consideration and solution."

Neither the facts as alleged in the indictment, nor as established by the evidence, constitute the crime of voluntary manslaughter. The pleader, in drafting the indictment, however, appears to have at least attempted to charge appellant with the offense of involuntary manslaughter. As the indictment is not assailed in this court, we need not determine its sufficiency as to the charge of involuntary manslaughter, but simply treat it, for the purpose of this appeal, as presenting such a charge. The crime of voluntary and involuntary manslaughter, as defined by the statutes of this state, is as follows: "Whoever unlawfully kills any human being without malice, express or implied, either voluntarily, upon a sudden heat, or involuntarily, but in the commission of some unlawful act, is guilty of manslaughter, and upon conviction thereof shall be imprisoned in the state prison," etc. Burns's Rev. Stat. 1901, § 1981 (Horner's Rev. Stat. § 1908). The statute prohibiting the carrying of concealed weapons is as follows: "Every person, not being a traveler, who shall wear or carry any dirk, pistol, bowie knife, dagger, sword in cane, or any other dangerous or deadly weapon, concealed . . . upon conviction thereof, shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $500." Section 2069, Burns's Rev. Stat. 1901 (§ 1985, Horner's Rev. Stat.).

It is conceded, and properly so, that, at the time of the homicide, appellant was carrying the pistol in question in violation of the above statute. The question arises, then, Did carrying the weapon unlawfully at the time of the homicide, in view of the other facts in the case, render the accused guilty of the crime of involuntary manslaughter, as charged in the indictment? The question, under the circumstances, as counsel for the state assert, is certainly a novel one, within the "annals of criminal jurisprudence," and we believe that a search for authorities to sustain the judgment below, under the facts, will be futile. The theory of the state in the lower court, as the case appears to have been placed before the jury under the evidence and instructions of the court, was that the carrying of the revolver concealed by appellant, in violation of the statute, was the commission of an unlawful act, from which the homicide resulted. It is undoubtedly true, as a general rule of law, that a person engaged in the commission of an unlawful act is legally responsible for all of the consequences which may naturally or necessarily flow or result from such unlawful act. But before this principle of law can have any application under the facts in the case at bar, it must appear that the homicide was the natural or necessary result of the act of appellant in carrying the revolver in violation of the statute. Burns's Rev. Stat. 1901, § 2215, prohibits, under penalty, any person from hunting birds or other species of game with firearms on Sunday. If appellant, instead of carrying the pistol in question concealed, had been hunting with the weapon on Sunday in violation of the above statute, and when so hunting he had accidentally discharged it and killed Garnett, who happened to be standing near by, could it, in reason, be asserted that his death was due to appellant's unlawful act of hunting on Sunday? Certainly not. If, while engaged in hunting in violation of the statute, the pistol, through or by reason of the culpable negligence of appellant, had been discharged, and killed the deceased, the law, under such circumstances, would not have attributed his death to the unlawful act of hunting, but would have imputed it to such negligence. In fact, under such circumstances, the unlawful act of hunting would not be a factor in, or add anything to, the case. It would constitute nothing more than a separate and distinct offense. An eminent author on Criminal Law says: "It is malum prohibitum, and not malum in se, for an unauthorized person to kill game in England contrary to the statutes; and if, in unlawfully shooting at game, he accidentally kills a man, it is no more criminal in him than if he were authorized." 1 Bishop, New Crim. Law, § 332. See also 1 East, P. C. p. 280; 2 Roscoe, Crim. Ev. p. 800. With equal reason and force it may be asserted that the mere fact that the accused was unlawfully carrying the weapon in question at the time it was accidentally discharged is not, under the circumstances, a material element in the case, for it is manifest that such unlawful act did not, during the scuffle between the parties, render the pistol any more liable to be discharged than though the carrying thereof had been lawful. Of course, the law exacts of all persons the duty of being exceedingly cautious and careful in the use of or the handling of fire arms or other dangerous agencies. Surber v. State, 99 Ind. 71. In fact, as a general rule, the law has such a high regard for human life that it considers as unlawful all acts which are dangerous to the person against whom they are directed, no matter how innocently they may be performed. A person will not be permitted to do an act which jeopardizes the life and safety of another, and then, upon plea of accident, escape liability for a homicide involuntarily resulting from his reckless or careless act or conduct. State v. Dorsey, 118 Ind. 167, 10 Am. St. Rep. 111, 20 N. E. 777; Gillett, Crim. Law, 2d ed. § 502; 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 191, and cases cited. It is not charged in the indictment in this case that the homicide resulted from the reckless, careless, or negligent manner in which appellant was using or handling the pistol at the time it was discharged. Consequently, under the pleading, even though the facts could be said to justify or sustain such a charge, the case is not brought within the rule of culpable negligence, as affirmed and enforced in State v. Dorsey, supra, wherein the defendant was charged in the indictment with having carelessly and negligently run a locomotive engine into a passenger car, thereby killing a person who was a passenger thereon. It will be readily seen that, under the charge made by the indictment, the case at bar does not fall within that class of cases where the homicide is the result of culpable carelessness or negligence of the accused party in using or handling a dangerous weapon. 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. pp. 191 to 195, inclusive, and cases cited in footnotes.

Without further comment upon the question involved, we conclude that the conviction of appellant was wrong. The judgment of the lower court is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court to grant appellant a new trial. The clerk will issue the proper order for the return of the prisoner.

(.....Kan.....)

*Section 1, chap. 186, p. 359, of the Laws of 1901, which provides that those who have served in the Army and Navy of the United States in the War of the Rebellion, and have been honorably discharged therefrom, shall be preferred for appointment to office in every public department, and upon all public works of the state, and of the cities and towns thereof, is constitutional.

(March 12, 1904.)

APPPLICATION for a writ of quo warranto to determine the validity of defendant's claim to exercise the office of superintendent of the electric-light plant of Topeka. Judgment for plaintiff.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. David Overmyer, for plaintiff:

Quo warranto is the proper remedy to recover possession of an office, its emoluments, etc.

Kan. Const. art. 3, § 3; Civil Code, § 652; Bartlett v. State, 13 Kan. 99; Neeland v. State, 39 Kan. 154, 18 Pac. 165; Hussey v. Hamilton, 5 Kan. 462; Hunt v. Pleasant Hill Cemetery Asso. 27 Kan. 737; Western Home Ins. Co. v. Wilder, 40 Kan. 561, 20 Pac. 265; State ex rel. Vance v. Wilson, 30 Kan. 661, 2 Pac. 828.

In the action of quo warranto to recover an office, this court will inquire into and decide every question necessary to determine who ought to have the office, and will install into the office the person entitled thereto.

State ex rel. Borders v. Hamilton County, 39 Kan. 85, 19 Pac. 2; Brown v. Jeffries, 42 Kan. 605, 22 Pac. 578; Tarbox v. Sughrue, 36 Kan. 225, 12 Pac. 935; Parker v. Hughes, 64 Kan. 216, 56 L. R. A. 275, 91 Am. St. Rep. 216, 67 Pac. 637.

An ordinance of the city of Topeka provided that all officers of said city should hold their offices until their successors should be elected and qualified.

Such provision renders the qualification as well as the choice of a successor necessary to divest the incumbent of the office.

Throop, Pub. Off. §§ 328, 331; People ex

rel. Williamson v. McKinney, 52 N. Y. 374; People ex rel. Illinois Midland R. Co. v. Barnett Twp. 100 Ill. 332; People ex rel. Battle v. McIver, 68 N. C. 467; People ex rel. Wetherbee v. Casneau, 20 Cal. 504.

Defendant was neither elected nor qualified, because, while the forms were complied with, the proceedings of the mayor and council, being in open and flagrant violation of the law, were void, and the pretended qualification of the defendant by taking the oath of office was also void.

The veterans' preference act is constitutional.

Of all forms of government, the Republic is in greatest need of stimulating patriotism among the people.

1 Montesquieu, Spirit of Laws, p. 38.

The rewards of patriotism are not only consistent with, but indispensable to, the public welfare, under every form of government which recognizes honor and virtue as motives of human action; and especially are such rewards indispensable to the welfare, the dignity, and the very life of a republic. Such acts of legislation as are designed to recognize and reward patriotism and patriotic sacrifice are not obnoxious to the rule of "equal rights for all, and special privileges for none."

Public office is a public trust, and not a right.

No man has any abstract right to any public office; and if, in the exercise of public powers for the public welfare, public authority prescribes qualifications and points of eligibility which he may not possess, but which others possess, he cannot claim that he is denied or deprived of any right.

Atchison Street R. Co. v. Missouri P. R. Co. 31 Kan. 660, 3 Pac. 284.

Mr. M. T. Campbell, for defendant:

The veterans' act is unconstitutional and against public policy, however commendable the patriotic spirit that prompted its passage.

There must be some legal reason for granting the special privilege to a certain class of citizens; as, for instance, when it calls for the exercise of the police power of the state.

The veterans' act makes the question of the public good and the general welfare of secondary consequence. Its sole purpose is to favor and benefit the individual,—a granting of a special privilege, pure and simple,—regardless of the public weal.

Atchison Street R. Co. v. Missouri P. R. Co. 31 Kan. 660, 3 Pac. 284.

Johnston, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

H. K. Goodrich and Porter Mitchell are each claiming the office of superintendent of the electric-light plant of Topeka. The term of this office is two years, and there is a provision that all officers of the city shall hold their offices until their successors are elected and qualified. Goodrich was duly chosen as superintendent, and continued to act in that capacity until April, 1903, which was the end of the term as fixed by ordinance. He then applied to the mayor and council of the city for appointment to the next regular term, and Mitchell made a like application. These were the only applicants for the place, and it is agreed that both are men of good reputations, are equally competent to perform the duties of the office, and equally eligible for appointment, unless Goodrich has a right to be preferred because of services and honorable discharge from the Army of the War of the Rebellion. Goodrich was a soldier in that war, and received an honorable discharge, while Mitchell never served in the Army or Navy at any time. With a knowledge of these facts, the mayor and council appointed Mitchell to this office, but the refusal to appoint Goodrich was not because he was lacking in qualifications, fitness, or eligibility, nor because Mitchell possessed any superior qualifications for the office. After Mitchell was appointed and had qualified he demanded the possession of the office, and when Goodrich declined to surrender it Mitchell took forcible possession and ousted Goodrich therefrom.

It is conceded that the result of this proceeding, and the right to the office in this contest, depends upon the constitutionality of an act spoken of as the "veterans' preference law." It provides: "That § 1 of chap. 160 [page 211] of the Laws of 1886 be and is hereby amended so as to read as follows: In grateful recognition of the service, sacrifices, and sufferings of persons who served in the Army and Navy of the United States in the War of the Rebellion and have been honorably discharged therefrom, they shall be preferred for appointment and employed to positions in every public department and upon all public works of the state of Kansas, and of the cities and towns of this state, over other persons of equal qualifications, and the person thus preferred shall not be disqualified from holding any position in said service on account of his age or by reason of any physical disability, provided such age or disability does not render him incompetent to perform the duties of the position applied for; and, when any such ex-soldier or sailor shall apply for appointment to any such position, place, or employment, the officer, board or person whose duty it is or may be to appoint a person to fill such place shall, before appointing anyone to such position, make an investigation as to the qualifications of said ex-soldier or sailor for such employment, and if he is a man of good reputation, and can perform the duties of said position so applied for by him, said officer, board, or person shall appoint said ex-soldier or sailor to such position, place, or employment." Laws 1901, chap. 186, § 1, p. 359. Other provisions are that a like preference shall be given if it becomes necessary to reduce the force in any of the departments, cities, or towns of the state, and also declares penalties against those who wilfully refuse or neglect to obey the provisions of the act.

The fundamental infirmity in the act is not specifically pointed out. It is said to be unequal and arbitrary in its operations; that the preference given to veterans necessarily restricts the privileges of others; and that it is given as reward for past services, without regard to the public service or the general welfare of the people. It is not contended that the act conflicts with any express provision of either the state or Federal Constitutions, but, rather, that it is contrary to the implications and spirit of our Constitution. The general doctrine is that, in the absence of constitutional limitations, the legislature may prescribe how and by whom offices shall be filled. There is no contract right or property interest in an office, and hence some of the constitutional principles invoked have no application. An office is a public agency, and an officer is a mere agent of the public, entitled to exercise the functions and perform the duties of the office for the public benefit, and not for his own. The main consideration in the selection of officers and agents is the public welfare, and the state, like any other principal, may select its agents, may determine for itself who can best accomplish its purpose, and whose appointment will best subserve the public good. When the Constitution prescribes a method, or imposes a limitation, the legislature is to that extent guided and controlled in choosing its officers, but no provision has been called to our attention which prohibits the giving of a preference to veterans of the Civil War. Constitutional limitations are prescribed with respect to eligibility and the holding of office, and among them are that a member of Congress, or officer of the state or of the United States, cannot hold the office of governor. Art. 1, § 10. Neither is a United States officer eligible to a seat in the legislature. Art. 2, § 5. Justices of the supreme court and judges of the district court cannot hold any other office during the terms for which they are elected. Art. 3, § 13. Persons who are under guardianship, have been convicted of a felony, who have defrauded the government, have given or received a bribe or offered to do so, have voluntarily borne arms against the government, with some exceptions, cannot hold office. Anyone who gives or accepts a challenge to fight a duel, or who carries a challenge to another, or who goes out of the state to fight a duel, is ineligible for office, and everyone who has given or offered a bribe to secure his own election is disqualified from holding office during the term for which he has been elected. Art. 5, §§ 2, 5, and 6. In the main, these are the provisions affecting the holding of office, and, aside from these restrictions, the whole matter is committed to the legislature by § 1 of article 15, wherein it is provided that "all officers whose election or appointment is not otherwise provided for shall be chosen or appointed as may be prescribed by law."

It is conceded that the matter of holding office is a political privilege; but it is argued that it becomes a special privilege when a class of citizens are given a preference over all others. Our Constitution differs materially from those of many of the states with respect to the granting of privileges. The only provision we have touching the subject is found in § 2 of the Bill of Rights, which is: "All political power is inherent in the people, and all free governments are founded on their authority, and are instituted for their equal protection and benefit. No special privileges or immunities shall ever be granted by the legislature, which may not be altered, revoked, or repealed by the same body; and this power shall be exercised by no other tribunal or agency." In most of the states the granting of special privileges or immunities is expressly prohibited; but, as will be observed, ours seemingly contemplates that such privileges may be granted, as it provides that none shall be granted that may not be altered, revoked, or repealed. The legislature may then exercise its judgment and discretion in the selection of officers, unhampered by restrictions, unless some are to be implied from those expressed or from the theory of our government. As an office is a public trust, to be held and exercised for the public benefit, it is always implied, perhaps, that officers shall be chosen with a view to carrying out that purpose. So it is said that a law permitting the selection of persons unfit for the office and unable to perform its duties is defective. In Brown v. Russell, 166 Mass. 14, 32 L. R. A. 253, 55 Am. St. Rep. 357, 43 N. E. 1005, it was in effect held that, in the absence of constitutional restrictions, the legislature had power to select officers at will, or to confer power of appointment on boards or officers; but that the appointment of a person or a class in preference to all others, without inquiry or determination whether the person appointed is actually qualified to perform the duties of the office, is inconsistent with the nature of our government. It was, therefore, held that a statute making the appointment of veterans compulsory when the appointing power should think the applicants were not qualified to perform the duties of the office sought was invalid. If that should be accepted as the correct view, our statute is not obnoxious to such a limitation, as it only gives a preference to ex-soldiers and sailors upon the theory of equality of qualifications. Nor is there any novelty in our legislation on the subject, as like preferences have been given by the legislatures of a great many states and by the Congress of the United States, and, except where the acts have been drawn so as to conflict with express constitutional provisions, they have been generally upheld. The supreme court of Massachusetts, in response to questions by the governor and council, held that the provisions of a civil service statute, giving a veteran the preference for appointments to offices that they were found competent to fill, were constitutional. And the same view was expressed with reference to a provision giving a preference in public employments. It was said: "We doubt whether a statute which purports to compel the commonwealth and its cities and towns to employ in the labor service persons who are not able to perform the labor, and to pay them wages as laborers, could be held to be either wholesome or reasonable. But if the section means that the civil service commissioners shall establish rules to secure the employment of veterans in the labor service of the commonwealth and its cities and town in preference to all other persons except women, if the veterans are found competent to perform the labor, we think the enactment is within the constitutional power of the general court." Opinion of the Justices, 166 Mass. 589, 34 L. R. A. 58, 44 N. E. 625. See also Opinion of the Justices, 145 Mass. 587, 13 N. E. 15; Com. v. Plaisted, 148 Mass. 375, 2 L. R. A. 142, 12 Am. St. Rep. 566, 19 N. E. 224; Re Sweeley, 12 Misc. 174, 33 N. Y. Supp. 369; *Stutzbach v. State v. Garbroski, 111 Iowa, 496, 56 L. R. A. 570, 82 Am. St. Rep. 524, 82 N. W. 959, is cited as an authority against the validity of a preference to veterans. That was a case where there was an attempted exemption of persons who had served in the Army and Navy from paying a license tax. That act, which affected liabilities and imposed burdens, gave rise to a very different question than is presented here. It was held to be a discrimination in violation of the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution, and a denial of the equal protection of the laws. Even in that case it was remarked that "possibly a veteran soldier or sailor would be preferred, everything else being equal, for civil office, because of superior fitness, resulting from discipline of service in the war; for 'it is distinctly a public purpose to promote patriotism, and to make conspicuous and honorable any exhibition of courage, constancy, and devotion to the welfare of the state.' But the work of a peddler calls for no qualities such as a soldier or sailor acquires in the service." State v. Shedrois, 75 Vt. 277, 63 L. R. A. 179, 98 Am. St. Rep. 825, 54 Atl. 1081, involves the same question, and was decided in the same way.

Office-holding is a political privilege, and the matter of appointment to office is not affected by the 14th Amendment or other provision of the Federal Constitution, and, as has been said, the power of the legislature is supreme in respect to appointments, save as the Constitution has limited it. Already statutes have been enacted which limit the number from whom officers may be chosen, and necessarily puts others who might desire these offices at a disadvantage. There are boards upon which only physicians can be appointed; others to which only dentists are eligible; others where architects or skilled mechanics have the preference; others where a woman is arbitrarily appointed; and still others where political opinions enter into the qualifications of members,—that is, enactments that members of boards shall be taken in certain proportions from different political parties. These acts are generally held to be within the legislative power, and the preferences and the exclusions so made to be reasonable and valid. Where the limitation from which officers shall be chosen is manifestly for the public good, and where the purposes sought and the ends attained in legislation in regard to the qualifications for office are the safety and welfare of the public, it cannot be said that the rights of any others are unduly affected or prejudiced. If we should lay aside the gratitude, mentioned in the first part of the section in question, for those who sacrificed and suffered in defense of the nation, there are reasonable and substantial considerations for making a preference in favor of the veterans. The love of country that induced them to fight for its existence and defend its institutions is some assurance, at least, of loyalty and fidelity in the civil service. In the nature of things the discipline of the Army and Navy tended to promote promptness, respect for authority, and obedience to law, courage to meet difficulties and overcome selfish and sinister influences, steadiness of purpose, perseverance, and devotion to duty. These considerations may very well have appealed to the discretion and judgment of the legislature in determining who could render the best service to the public, and we see no reason why they are not reasonable and sufficient. In the civil service laws of the country, conceded to be beneficial and valid, a preference is given because of the former experience in the public service, and why should not the public service of those who imperiled their lives in the defense of their country receive like recognition and preference? As counsel for the plaintiff has well said: "A grateful recognition of the services, sufferings, and sacrifices of persons who have served the state in war has always been recognized by all nations as the exercise of the highest public policy, as the surest guaranty of the future safety, honor, and welfare of the state." In Keim v. United States, 177 U. S. 290, 44 L. ed. 774, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 574, the preference law enacted by Congress was considered and interpreted, but its constitutionality seems to have been conceded, as no attack was made upon its validity. Judge Brewer, in deciding it, remarked that "no thoughtful person questions the obligations which the nation is under to those who have done faithful service in its Army and Navy." That such service afforded reasonable grounds for preference in public offices and employments was recognized in Brown v. Russell, 166 Mass. 14, 32 L. R. A. 253, 55 Am. St. Rep. 357, 43 N. E. 1005, where it was remarked that "it may be said that, other qualifications being equal, there are reasons to believe that a veteran soldier or sailor often will make a better civil officer than a person who never has been subjected to the discipline of service in war; and it is distinctly a public purpose to promote patriotism, and to make conspicuous and honorable any exhibition of courage, constancy, and devotion to the welfare of the state, shown in the public service. These things we assume the legislature may take into account in providing for appointments to office, where the qualifications are not prescribed by the Constitution." The court, in Opinion of the Justices, 186 Mass. 595, 34 L. R. A. 58, 44 N. E. 627, in speaking of the belief that faithful service in, and honorable discharge from, the War of the Rebellion developed such qualifications of character in men that it was to the interest of the commonwealth to appoint them to office in preference to others, said: "The general court may have so thought on the ground, either that such a person would be likely to possess courage, constancy, habits of obedience and fidelity, which are valuable qualifications for any public office or employment, or that the recognition of the services of veterans in the way provided for by the statute would promote that love of country and devotion to the welfare of the state which it concerns the commonwealth to foster. If such was the opinion of the general court, we cannot say that it was beyond its constitutional power to enact this section. Of the wisdom of such legislation we are not made the judges." Faithful service and devotion to duty in the past have always been regarded as good considerations for preference or promotion in every department of life, public and private, and it belonged to the legislature to determine what qualifications and experience give the best assurance of faithful, honest, and efficient public service. The case is quite unlike the one supposed of a right to office by those affiliated with a particular church or a particular party, or because of some private achievement. The preference that is made here has its basis on services to the public and experience and fidelity in the public service, and we think it was within the constitutional power of the legislature to make such a preference.

It is conceded that the plaintiff possessed every qualification, and was entitled to re-appointment as against the defendant, who was the only other applicant for the position. The mayor and council were therefore required to give the plaintiff the preference, and, under the circumstances, had no power or authority to appoint the defendant. The plaintiff, being in the office, was entitled to continue until someone was legally appointed, and, therefore, had a right to bring a proceeding in quo warranto to obtain the possession of the office.

Judgment will therefore be given in favor of the plaintiff.

A. B. BAXTER, Appt.,

v.

George E. DENEEN et al.

(.....Md.....)

1. Equity will not interfere to enjoin one with whom margins have been deposited in a stock-gambling transaction from violating his agreement to keep them upon deposit in a bank until the transaction is closed, and prevent his withdrawing them from the bank, although he intends to remove the funds from the state, and thereby defraud the complainant.

2. A bill to enjoin a broker from withdrawing from the bank margins which have been deposited with him on stock-gambling transactions will not be entertained as a suit for an accounting because other customers are made parties defendant, and an accounting is alleged to be necessary to settle the conflicting interests, where only two of such customers answer the bill, and they decline to state the nature of their transactions, one even admitting that he has abandoned his interest.

(McSherry, Ch. J., dissents.)

(December 4, 1903.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Circuit Court for Allegany County enjoining the withdrawal from a bank of money which had been advanced as margins in a stock-gambling transaction. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Robert R. Henderson, Gans & Haman, and W. Calvin Chesnut, for appellant:

Baxter was the absolute owner of this money.

The bank was not a stakeholder between Baxter and his customers as to this account.

23 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 18; 2 Bouvier, Law Dict. p. 543.

The moneys paid by the customers were payments on account, and not in the nature of stakes.

McClain v. Fleshman, 46 C. C. A. 15, 106 Fed. 881.

The transactions between Baxter and his customers were gambling transactions within the eyes of the law.

Burt v. Myer, 71 Md. 467, 18 Atl. 796; Stewart v. Schall, 65 Md. 289, 57 Am. Rep. 327, 4 Atl. 399; Cover v. Smith, 82 Md. 586, 34 Atl. 465; Billingslea v. Smith, 77 Md. 504, 26 Atl. 1077.

This suit is, in substance, merely an effort on the part of the customer to recover margins paid to his broker. If a court of law could not entertain a suit founded on such a transaction, surely equity would not. Neither law nor equity will enforce any rights claimed under gambling transactions.

The effect of sustaining the decree in this case means the supervision by courts of equity of gambling agreements. It means the establishment of a new branch of equity jurisdiction.

Cover v. Smith, 82 Md. 586, 34 Atl. 465; Albertson v. Laughlin, 173 Pa. 529, 51 Am. St. Rep. 777, 34 Atl. 216.

Messrs. Benjamin A. Richmond and Pearre & Lewis, for appellees:

The bank was in fact a stakeholder, not only because it held a joint stake, but because it was so understood by the parties to the stake. Whether the bank knew it was such a stakeholder is wholly immaterial.

Alford v. Burke, 21 Ga. 46, 68 Am. Dec. 449.

Our remedy in equity to have an account of this fund and to have a decree against said bank for our share thereof is clear. Equity clearly had jurisdiction, in the first place, to restrain Baxter from withdrawing the fund from the bank on the ground of fraud, and, having once acquired jurisdiction for this purpose, it may proceed to determine the whole cause.

When Deneen intervenes and shows that the money delivered to the bank was his money, to which he is now entitled, the credit in the bank as a matter of law is no longer a credit due to Baxter, but is a credit due to Deneen. 64 L. R. A.

Schmucker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellee, Deneen, in the bill filed by him in this case, declares his purpose to repudiate certain contracts made with the appellant, Baxter, a stockbroker, for speculating in stocks on margins, and asks the court to compel the return to him of the margins paid by him to Baxter under the contracts. He also asks for an injunction to prevent the withdrawal from bank by Baxter of certain money standing there to his credit, upon the ground that it consists of the margins so paid. Both parties to the record admit on their briefs that the contracts in question were mere gambling contracts, predicated upon the expected rise or fall of the stock market, and were not intended to be executed by actual purchases or sales of stocks. They both also concede the proposition that equity will not lend its aid to enforce gambling contracts, but the appellee contends that his bill does not ask the court to enforce any contracts, but simply to compel the return to him of the margins which he paid upon gambling contracts that he now repudiates.

The material facts of the case, as we find them from the record, may be stated as follows:

Early in September, 1902, Baxter, at his office in Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, informed Deneen that he was considering the desirability of opening what is commonly called a "bucket shop," for speculating in stocks on margins, in the city of Cumberland, where Deneen resided. A similar business had theretofore been conducted in Cumberland by one Cummings, who is said to have decamped with all the funds of the business; thereby inflicting serious losses upon Deneen and other persons who were his customers. Deneen replied to Baxter that it would be useless to send a stranger there, as he could get no trade, and advised him to get H. H. Hartsock, who had been Cummings's agent, to take charge of the office, if he determined to open one, and to permit Hartsock to handle the money. To this Baxter replied that he would not put money in Cumberland in any other name than his own, but he was willing to do anything else, and would not object to permitting it to be known how much money he had in bank in Cumberland from time to time. Within a few days thereafter, Baxter opened a bucket shop in Cumberland, and placed it in charge of Hartsock, as manager. He at the same time deposited $10,000 in his own credit in the Third National Bank of Cumberland, and instructed the bank to inform Hartsock from time to time of the amount standing to the credit of the account. Hartsock thereafter deposited to the credit of the bank account thus standing in Baxter's name all margins received from customers in the course of the business at the Cumberland office. When the deal of any customer at the office was closed, the balance, if any, due to him, was paid out of this money standing to Baxter's credit in the bank, which was drawn out by checks signed by Baxter, and not by Hartsock. Deneen, who was a frequent, if not habitual, speculator in stocks on margins, at once began operating through the Cumberland office, and soon became its chief customer. Within a few days after opening the office, Hartsock, its manager, wrote, with the knowledge of Deneen, the following letter to Baxter, his principal:

Cumberland, Md., Sept. 10th, 1902.

Mr. A. B. Baxter, Pittsburg, Pa.:—

Everybody seems to be pleased with our arrangements except on one point and that is a weak one and makes the whole structure without a good foundation, and that is you can withdraw all the funds in bank at any time and we are left as we were last week by Cummings & Co.

Cannot you fortify the point and then we can get the trade? The president of the 3d Nat'l B'k thinks you should do so, in fact unless it is done, certain large and the best trade cannot be secured and it may be hardly any business can be retained, as there is an effort being made to have a N. Y. Stock Exchange open an office here which would get that trade at least.

Let me hear from you on this matter and favorably. The Cumberland trade has had a hard knock and something out of ordinary must be done to restore confidence.

Very truly yours,

H. H. Hartsock.

To that letter Baxter sent the following reply, which was shown to Deneen:

Pittsburg, Pa., Sept. 11th, 1902.

H. H. Hartsock, Esq., Cumberland, Md.

Dear Sir:—

Your favor of 10th inst. rec'd & noted. We talked the matter of which you speak over with both Mrs. Deneen when they were here & told them that we would not consent to anybody controlling our funds. There is no doubt that a good many of your people there feel very badly over the treatment received from Cummings & Co. I told them (Mess. Deneen,) to inquire as to our standing here, not only at the Bank, but on the street generally, & from other brokers & I am satisfied that they would find that we are regarded in a different manner from which the people regarded Cummings & Co.

We would like to have your business; we could not under any circumstances agree to have anybody interfere with the management of our finances.

Yours truly,

A. B. Baxter.

Subsequently, after Deneen had been trading for some time with the Cumberland office, he was called by it for over $6,000 additional margins. When he responded to that call with the money asked for, he said to Hartsock that his understanding was that all margins were to remain in bank until the trades for which they were put up were closed, or the margins were exhausted, and he desired to know something more about it. Hartsock thereupon telegraphed to Baxter for information on the subject, and received from him a reply saying: "We will always have more money than the sheet is worth there. We don't want—draw any money down or have not done so. Ask the bank for balance." The precise meaning of the technical expression, "more money than the sheet is worth," was the subject of a conflict of testimony, but it is not necessary, in the view which we take of this case, to settle that controversy.

After these occurrences, Deneen continued to deal heavily with the Cumberland office in similar stock transactions, until October 7, 1902, up to which time he had paid to Hartsock $18,253 as margins on deals then remaining open and unfinished. At that time $33,253 stood to the credit of Baxter on the account already referred to, in the Third National Bank. On that day, October 7th, just before the bank closed, Baxter drew out of it $15,000, through an agent whom he had sent to Cumberland for that purpose, and who on the next morning presented a check for $17,000. The bank refused to pay this check, as Deneen, having gotten wind of Baxter's purpose to withdraw the money, had filed the present bill, and procured an injunction thereon restraining the bank from paying out any of the money standing to Baxter's credit until the further order of the court. Deneen also sued out of the law side of the court an attachment against Baxter for the recovery of the $18,253 of margins, and laid it in the hands of the bank.

The bill of complaint alleges that all of the contracts were entered into by the plaintiff, and the margins thereon paid by him, upon the distinct understanding and agreement between him and Baxter, with the knowledge and assent of the bank, that the margins were to remain in the bank until the contracts on which they were paid were closed. The evidence, however, does not satisfy us that Baxter made any positive agreement to do more than keep money enough there to make the sheet good, whatever may be the exact meaning of that expression, although he disclaimed any desire to withdraw the balance of his account. There is no evidence at all that the bank had any knowledge of, or gave any assent to the arrangement or understanding between Deneen and Baxter relative to the retention of the money in bank. The bill also charges that the drawing of the $15,000 out of bank by Baxter, and the attempted drawing of $17,000 more, constituted flagrant violations of the agreement under which Deneen had paid his margins, and that it had been done with a deliberately fraudulent intent and purpose to remove the money from this state and convert it to his own use, and cheat and defraud Deneen and the other customers who had dealt with him at Cumberland upon the same terms. It is also averred that the other persons who are named as defendants had similar stock dealings with Baxter, and may be interested in the balance to his credit in bank, and also that he is financially irresponsible. The prayer for relief asks for a decree for an accounting between the parties to the suit in respect to their relative rights to the money in bank to Baxter's credit, and for an injunction to restrain the bank from parting with the money pendente lite, and for general relief. An injunction was granted as prayed, and the defendant made a motion for its dissolution.

The bank's answer admits the making of the several deposits with it, and that it was instructed by Baxter to let Hartsock know the balance whenever he wished, but it flatly denies that it had any knowledge of any agreement between Deneen and Baxter as to the deposits, or the uses to which they were to be put. Baxter's answer admits the dealings on margins in stocks with Deneen, but insists that it was definitely understood that the margins were to be paid by Hartsock to him for his own account, to be dealt with as he saw fit, and that he only agreed to keep as much money in Cumberland as the sheet was worth; and he avers that he did keep that much money there.

Two other defendants (Botchford and Swartzwelder) answer the bill, admitting that they had dealings with Baxter through Hartsock, but do not state the particulars thereof, and they submit their rights to be determined by the judgment of the court.

The court below, by its decree of May 23, 1903, overruled the motion to dissolve the injunction, and held the plaintiff to be entitled to the relief for which he prayed, and sent the case to the auditor to state an account. An account was stated and returned by the auditor, distributing the net balance of the money in bank to Deneen to the extent of $18,096.86, to Hetzel to the extent of $68.60, and to Swartzwelder to the extent of $88.20. This account was ratified, and Baxter appealed from the decree of May 23, 1903, and also from the order ratifying the account.

We do not agree with the conclusion arrived at by the learned judge below. It plainly appears by the record that Baxter, when urged by Deneen and Hartsock to keep some money in bank at Cumberland upon such terms that he could not withdraw it at will, positively refused to do so; saying to them that he would under no circumstances agree to have anybody interfere with him in the management of his finances. The most that he could at any time be induced to agree to was to keep more money there than the sheet was worth, accompanied by the statement that he did not wish to draw down any money. With these facts staring him in the face, Deneen did not require the moneys supplied by him for margins to be retained under the joint control of Baxter or Hartsock and himself, or to be held by some third person as stakeholder; nor did he retain any lien thereon. He deliberately paid them over absolutely to Hartsock, knowing that they would be deposited in bank to the credit of Baxter, and would thus pass under his absolute control. He thus voluntarily parted with his title to the money, and relied solely for his protection upon the personal agreement of Baxter, which he himself asserts formed a material part of his gambling contracts. He now by his bill in this case in effect asks a court of equity to compel the performance of this agreement. He does not in terms ask for a decree for a specific performance, but he does so in effect, for the avowed purpose for which he asks an injunction against the bank is to prevent Baxter from violating his agreement by withdrawing from the bank the balance of the money still standing to his credit. To prevent Baxter from violating his agreement is, to all intents and purposes, simply to compel him to perform it. Equity regards the substance of a transaction, and not its mere form. Nor can we yield assent to the appellee's contention that the money in bank should be treated as affected by a trust, or subject to an equitable lien in his favor, without in effect enforcing the agreement, for such a trust or lien must rest upon or arise out of the terms of the agreement, which the appellee insists required that the money should remain in the bank until the deals in connection with which it was paid were completed.

This court has repeatedly held that even the law does not permit actions to be maintained on contracts like those now under consideration, for fictitious purchases and sales of stocks, because they are regarded as gambling contracts. Stewart v. Schall, 65 Md. 289, 57 Am. Rep. 327, 4 Atl. 399; Burt v. Myer, 71 Md. 467, 18 Atl. 796; Billingslea v. Smith, 77 Md. 519, 26 Atl. 1077; Cover v. Smith, 82 Md. 614, 34 Atl. 465. Much less does equity lend its aid to their enforcement. A court of equity undoubtedly has jurisdiction to trace money or property unlawfully obtained from its true owner, and to intervene and secure it for him by impounding it by injunction or giving him a lien on it, but it will not exercise that jurisdiction on behalf of one who was himself a voluntary participant in the unlawful transaction by which he lost his money. The doctrine that equity will not actively interpose for the relief of a party who has been a particeps criminis in an illegal or fraudulent transaction is not only one of general acceptance, but it has on different occasions received the direct sanction of this court. Roman v. Mali, 42 Md. 513; Snyder v. Snyder, 51 Md. 80; Brown v. Reilly, 72 Md. 489, 20 Atl. 239. This rule, as was said in Roman v. Mali by former Chief Judge Alvey, "is most salutary and conservative, as a means of suppressing illegal and fraudulent contracts, and nothing should be done by the courts to weaken its force or operation."

If Deneen desires to repudiate his gambling contracts, and sue Baxter for the recovery of the margins paid on account of them, as constituting the stakes of executory wagers, a court of law is the appropriate forum in which to test his rights in that respect. Conceding, for the sake of the argument, without so deciding, that he would be entitled to recover in such a suit at law, we see no special circumstances in the facts appearing in this record which should induce a court of equity to depart from the salutary rule to which we have already referred, and intervene in his behalf. The bill alleges that a number of persons named as defendants were similarly interested with the plaintiff in the money in bank, and that an accounting between all parties interested would be necessary in order to determine their conflicting interests, and to prevent a multiplicity of suits at law. But only two of those persons answered the bill, and they declined to state what transactions they had had with Baxter, or the circumstances under which they were made, and simply in the most general terms submitted their rights to the determination of the court. After the case was sent to the auditor, Swartzwelder, one of the defendants, testified that he had put up $90 with Hartsock on a deal, and that he saw no other way to get back his money than to claim a percentage of the money in bank. Another witness (Hetzel) testified that he had put up $70 as margins with Hartsock on some deals, but had afterwards dropped the deals. In our judgment, the facts disclosed by this evidence afford no sufficient ground upon which to rest the jurisdiction of a court of equity in a case like this.

The case of Dauler v. Hartley, 178 Pa. 23, 35 Atl. 857, in which a court of equity did intervene for the relief of persons who had put up money to be used as margins in stock-gambling adventures, was much relied on by the appellees, but it is distinguishable from the one at bar. In that case a person, to whom a number of individuals had intrusted money to be employed in speculation in stocks, put all of the money in the hands of a banking firm, to the credit of the broker through whom the dealings were to be made, upon the express understanding that the bankers were not to allow the broker to draw any of the money without the consent of the depositor. There were many deposits, and still more numerous withdrawals of money, which was applied to different stock dealings. The court here held the controversy to be over a resulting balance, in which many persons were interested, and took jurisdiction of the case because the remedy at law would have been inadequate. Under the circumstances of that case, the depositors of the money not only had retained control over it, but were the actual owners of the balance remaining in the hands of the bankers. It was quite a different case from the one now before us, in which the plaintiff voluntarily paid over the margins to the broker in reliance upon a mere personal agreement, the practical enforcement of which is essential to affording him the relief which he now seeks.

Nor will the court exercise its equitable powers, at the suit of Deneen, to prevent Baxter from violating his agreement to allow the money to remain in the bank at Cumberland, upon the ground of preventing the accomplishment of a gross fraud on his part by its withdrawal from bank, and its removal from the limits of this state. The same difficulty lies in the way of the court's actively interfering in any manner which would practically give to Deneen the benefit of the enforcement of any of the provisions of these gambling contracts, into which he voluntarily entered without oppression or compulsion, and with a full knowledge of their nature and effect.

The decree and order appealed from will be reversed, and the bill dismissed. Decree and order reversed, and bill dismissed, with costs.

McSherry, Ch. J., dissenting:

After a careful examination of the record in this case, I find myself unable to agree to the conclusions reached by the majority of the court, and, though it is exceedingly distasteful to dissent, I am constrained to do so, for the reasons which I will now briefly state:

Without narrating the facts disclosed by the evidence, it is sufficient to say that the litigation had its origin in a gambling transaction between the appellant and the appellees. The gambling transaction was a betting on the rise or fall of the market price of stocks, and was made between some very foolish men, on the one side, and, according to the evidence, a very tricky man, on the other side. The appellant conducted in Cumberland what is known as a "bucket shop." The foolish people bet on the market price of stock, and put their money in the hands of the bucket-shop proprietor. They might just as well have bet their money against loaded dice or marked cards. The money which they put up was deposited in the name of the bucket-shop proprietor in the Third National Bank of Cumberland, to abide the result of the bet; but it did not, even under the terms of the contract between them, thereby become the property of the appellant, or cease to belong to the appellees, at least until the gambling transactions were actually closed, and the money was in fact paid over by the stakeholder to the winner. Before the event had occurred upon which the wager depended, the appellees rescinded their contract, and demanded from the stakeholder, the Third National Bank, a return of the money they had staked. They did this by way of attachment, and they followed that proceeding by filing a bill in equity to restrain the stakeholder from paying to the appellant the money held by the bank. The court below decreed that the money belonged to the appellees, and made the injunction perpetual. As I understand it, a majority of this court now holds that the decree thus passed was erroneous, because both parties to the gambling transaction, namely, the foolish men, on the one side, and the tricky man, on the other, were in equal fault, and, being in equal fault, the court will leave them where they have placed themselves, and will give its aid to neither. That conclusion seems to me to be contrary to the whole current of judicial decisions both in England and in this country. The doctrine of in pari delicto cannot possibly, it seems to me, have any application to the situation disclosed by this record, and for two reasons:

First. In a sense, both parties to the gambling transaction were equally in fault for violating the law in making these bets, but there the equality of fault comes to an end. Their conduct was not criminal or immoral, but it was illegal. The appellees, besides acting illegally, were guilty of folly, just as they would have been if, instead of betting on the rise and fall of the market, they had bet against loaded dice or marked cards; but the appellant, if the evidence adduced be worthy of credit, was involved in a scheme to defraud, which, of course, included a degree of moral turpitude which cannot be ascribed to the appellees. After the funds had been deposited with the stakeholder, to be held under stipulated conditions, the appellant surreptitiously endeavored to withdraw the funds that remained in the custody of the stakeholder, after secretly checking out a considerable portion of the money that he had agreed should remain on deposit in the Third National Bank. I fail to see, in the light of these circumstances, how the folly of the appellees can be said to be on a footing of equality with the turpitude of the appellant; and, if there is no equality in this regard, there can be no such equal fault as to justify the application of the doctrine that, where the plaintiff and defendant are in pari delicto, the condition of the defendant is the better. There is a distinction between contracts which are immoral or criminal, and those which are simply illegal and void. To the latter class, gambling contracts belong. They are made void by the statute of 9 Anne, chap. 14. In Vischer v. Yates, 11 Johns. 23, Chancellor Kent said: "And the courts take a distinction between contracts that are immoral or criminal, and such as are simply illegal and void. Assistance is usually given to the party in the latter cases to recover back his money, and this court lent such assistance in the case of Mount v. Waite, 7 Johns. 434." But beyond this, the policy of our statutory law is distinctly against the application of the in pari delicto doctrine to gambling contracts, and that doctrine furnishes no defense to an action brought by the loser to recover back money won from him, and actually paid over to the winner. By Code, art. 27, § 127, it is enacted that "any person who may lose money at a gaming table may recover back the same as if it were a common debt." And § 128 provides that "all games, devices, and contrivances at which money . . . shall be bet or wagered shall be deemed a gaming table within the meaning of the six preceding sections." And by § 130 it is declared that "the courts shall construe the preceding sections relating to gambling and betting, liberally, so as to prevent the mischiefs intended to be provided against." Surely a defendant who has been sued for money which he won from the plaintiff by gambling could not successfully invoke as a defense the maxim, In pari delicto potior est conditio defendentis. Why should he be able to do so in a court of equity?

Secondly. But, in addition to this, I have never known it to be suggested that a man who bets, and then recants and repudiates the transaction whilst the wager is still in the hands of the stakeholder, is precluded from recovering the money he had staked, if the holder of the stakes refused, upon demand, to return it. This, if authority were needed for the proposition, has been explicitly decided by the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts in Morgan v. Beaumont, 121 Mass. 7. That case arose in this way: The defendant prior to May 22, 1875, received of the plaintiff the sum of $100 as a stakeholder on a wager between the plaintiff and one Woodward upon the result of a horse race which actually took place on May 22, 1875. This money was to be paid to the winner of the bet after the race. After the race, while the money was still in the hands of the defendant, the plaintiff, claiming that the race was not fairly had, and that the decision of the judges of the race was not fairly made, forbade the defendant paying the money to Woodward, and requested the defendant to pay the same to him, which the defendant refused to do. Afterwards, the money still remaining in the defendant's hands, the plaintiff commenced this action. The defendant well knew of the wager, and knew that the deposit of money was made in aid of illegal trotting and horse racing; and, at the time of the racing, both the plaintiff and defendant were present, encouraging it. The court, speaking by Chief Justice Gray, thus disposed of the controversy: "The wager was illegal; the winner had no right to the money; the stakeholder was a mere depositary; and the plaintiff, having demanded the money before it was paid over, was not in pari delicto, and was entitled to recover his deposit from the stakeholder, whether it was still in his hands, or had been paid by him to the winner after notice from the plaintiff not to do so. The fact, insisted upon at the argument, that the defendant knew of and promoted the illegal wager, affords him no protection. White v. Franklin Bank, 22 Pick. 181-189; McKee v. Manice, 11 Cush. 357; Love v. Harvey, 114 Mass. 80; Fisher v. Hildreth, 117 Mass. 558."

The jurisdiction of a court of equity in Maryland to grant relief in a case like this is clear, unless Gough v. Pratt, 9 Md. 526, and several cases which have followed it, be treated as flatly overruled. In the case just cited a bill was filed by Gough for an injunction to restrain execution of a judgment recovered against him on a bond, upon the ground that the consideration of the bond was money won in betting and gambling at cards. The bond was given by Gough to Sollers, who was named as the payee therein, and who, as was alleged, had won at cards from Gough $869, the amount payable on the bond. The bond was assigned by Sollers to James Kent, and, at its maturity, suit was instituted in the name of Sollers, for the use of Kent, against Gough, and judgment by default was subsequently entered thereon. Thereafter a fieri facias was issued upon the judgment. Thereupon Gough filed his bill against Sollers and Kent to restrain an execution of the judgment upon the ground above stated. Kent being dead, his administrator, Pratt, appeared, and demurred to the bill. It was insisted that a court of equity had no jurisdiction to restrain execution of the judgment, because, first, the bond was not void; and, secondly, because, even admitting it to be void as between Gough and Sollers, still Kent, being an innocent purchaser for value, without notice of the gambling transaction, was entitled to enforce the judgment. But this court, following closely and unequivocally adopting the opinion of the late Chief Justice Taney in Thomas v. Watson, Taney, 297, Fed. Cas. No. 13,913, decided in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Maryland, held that the bond was void under the statute of 9 Anne, chap. 14, which was then and still is in force in Maryland; that, being void, equity had jurisdiction to restrain its payment, even though it had been reduced to a judgment; and, finally, that, as the circulation of gambling bonds is an evil no less to be discontinued than the giving of them, a holder thereof by assignment for value, without notice of the illegal consideration, was in no better condition to collect the money apparently due on the bond than the payee himself would have been. In the course of the very lucid opinion of Chief Justice Taney, above referred to, and distinctly adopted by this court in Gough v. Pratt, it was stated by that eminent and distinguished jurist: "And as regards a security for money lost by gaming, it was, indeed, said by Lord Talbot that it could not be recovered, both parties being equally in default. But that point did not arise in the case before him, and was an obiter dictum, when deciding upon a question of usury, and the point was decided otherwise in the case of Rawden v. Shadwell, 1 Ambl. 269. In the last-mentioned case a bond had been given for money lost at play, and part of the money paid upon the bond, yet the court, upon the bill fled for that purpose, decreed that the bond should be delivered up to be canceled and the money repaid. Indeed, there can be no sound reason for distinguishing securities for money won at play from securities founded in usury, so as to give any advantage to the former over the latter, for they are both prohibited by law, both contrary to its settled policy. And while the laws against usury are intended to protect the necessitous against the oppression of the money lender, and against hard and ruinous contracts forced upon them by their wants, the laws against gaming are founded upon a policy equally sound and clear, and are intended to discountenance and discourage a vice injurious to society, and often most ruinous to the individual. If, therefore, the money has been paid by Lloyd upon these two notes, it is evident the complainant might, by a bill filed, have recovered it back; and, if the court of chancery would have interfered after the money had been actually paid, is there any principle of equity which will prevent it from interposing where the party has omitted to defend himself at law and confessed a judgment?

. . . If it will lend its aid to a party after he has acknowledged the justice of a debt by the payment of the money, there can be no sufficient reason for refusing to interpose where the party has omitted to make the defense in an action at law, and acknowledged the debt by confessing the judgment. In either case the court acts to prevent the party from retaining an advantage which he has obtained under a contract forbidden by law, and to uphold an established public policy intended in the one case to guard against oppression, and in the other to suppress a vice injurious to society.

. . . When the public policy established by the legislature is so obvious, and is so clearly founded in the principles of justice and required by the interests of society, it would ill become a court of equity by narrow and technical constructions to deprive itself of the power of enforcing it." Gough v. Pratt has been followed in Emerson v. Townsend, 73 Md. 224, 20 Atl. 984; Huntington v. Emery, 74 Md. 70, 21 Atl. 495; Spies v. Rosenstock, 87 Md. 17, 39 Atl. 268; and it seems to me it ought not, after the lapse of nearly fifty years, to be overruled, when the result of overruling it is to enable the tricky gambler to get from the stakeholder the money which the foolish better deposited there, but, upon repenting of his folly, now seeks, after rescinding his illegal bargain, to get back. If a court of equity, under these circumstances, has no power by injunction to prevent the bucket-shop gambler from drawing the funds belonging to the appellees out of bank, and has no process by which those funds can be kept from going into the pocket of the trickster, though the unlawful contract has been repudiated, it is high time that a legislative enactment should explicitly confer such a jurisdiction. I think a court of equity is clothed with both the power and the process to administer redress and to afford relief in this case, and I am decidedly of opinion that the decree passed by Judge Boyd in the circuit court was right, and that it ought to be affirmed.

A motion for reargument having been filed, Schmucker, J., on March 23, 1904, handed down the following response:

The appellee has made a motion for a reargument of this case, and has filed a carefully prepared brief in support of his motion. The brief reasserts the arguments advanced in his brief used at the hearing of the case, and urgently contends, first, that the money paid on account of the gambling contracts by Deneen to Baxter, and by the latter deposited in bank to his own credit, must be considered to be the property of Deneen, to which Baxter never had any legal or equitable title, and the bank must be treated as holding it in the capacity of a stakeholder; and, secondly, that under the authority of the decision in Gough v. Pratt, 9 Md. 526, Deneen, upon repudiating the contracts, was entitled, not only to sue in a court of equity to recover back the money which he had paid under the contracts, but was also entitled to the active aid of that court to prevent, by injunction, the withdrawal by Baxter of the money deposited by him, and standing to his unconditional credit in the bank.

This money is clearly not stakes, in the ordinary sense of that term, which signifies something deposited by two persons with a third on condition that it is to be delivered to the one who shall become entitled to it by the happening of a specified contingency. Deneen voluntarily paid the money to Baxter, with full knowledge of the latter's positive refusal to hold it subject to any condition or any joint control. Although it is now in the bank, it was deposited by Baxter alone, and for his own account, and was entered to his credit by the bank. Deneen himself distinctly admitted on cross-examination that he knew that Baxter had the right to withdraw the money from the bank at any time, and that he had dealt with Baxter on the faith of the latter's promise that he would not withdraw it, and not upon the idea that he had no legal right to withdraw it. Furthermore, when Deneen determined to repudiate his contracts, he did not at first claim that this money was his own, or that it was held by the bank as a stakeholder and appeal to a court of equity to compel its return to him; but, acting advisedly and with the aid of counsel, he, as he informs us in his brief, sued out an attachment from a court of law against Baxter to recover it from him, and laid the writ in the hands of the bank, to bind the money as a credit due from it to Baxter. Copies of the account filed and affidavit made by Deneen in the attachment case appear in the present record, and they charge Baxter with the indebtedness as for money loaned to him by Deneen—a form of pleading entirely inappropriate to the recovery of money knowingly paid or advanced as the stakes of a gambling venture. The record contains no indication that this attachment suit has ever been dismissed or abandoned. The evidence shows that the money was in fact paid to Baxter on account of the gambling contracts as margins, just as the margins were paid which were involved in the case of Burt v. Myer, cited in our opinion now on file in this case, with the additional circumstance that Baxter agreed, as part of the contracts in the present case, to keep money enough on deposit in Cumberland to make the sheet good, or, as Deneen, in his cross-examination, expresses it: "The sheet was to be covered at all times,—more than enough money left here."

Nor do we think that the case of Gough v. Pratt, when rightly understood, furnishes any authority for granting the relief prayed for in the present case. What was decided in that case was that equity would prevent the enforcement of a gambling contract, by enjoining the issue of execution on a judgment which had been recovered on a gambling debt. The case was decided upon the authority of Thomas v. Watson, and the opinion of Judge Taney in that case was inserted in full by our reporter as an appendix to Gough v. Pratt. In Thomas v. Watson the bill was filed by an assignee of the alleged debtor for discovery, and for relief by injunction against an execution on a judgment that had been recovered on two notes, one of which was alleged, on information and belief, to have been recovered for a gambling debt, and the other for a usurious debt. That, also, was a case in which equity extended relief against the attempted enforcement of gambling and usurious debts. Nothing that was required to be decided in either of those two cases affords any authority for the active interference of equity in aid of the practical enforcement of any of the stipulations of a gambling contract, which we have, in our opinion already filed, shown is the relief which the court is, in effect, asked to afford in the present case. In Judge Taney's opinion in Thomas v. Watson there appear the obiter statements that in a case of usury or gambling, although the party pays his money, not only with a knowledge of the facts, but with a knowledge of the law also, equity will relieve him and compel the adverse party to refund the money, and that in such cases the money may be recovered back again, either by a suit at law or a bill in equity; but an examination of the authorities cited in support of the statements satisfies us that that distinguished jurist could not have intended by what he there said to assert that the plaintiff in such cases might resort to either law or equity, according to his own preference or caprice, or that a court of equity would entertain his suit for the recovery of his money in the absence of facts constituting recognized grounds of equity jurisdiction. In Fonblanque's Equity, bk. 1, chap. 4, § 7, the authority cited in reference to usurious contracts says that equity will give relief to the borrower in cases where the law will not reach the lender. In Rawden v. Shadwell, 1 Amb. 269, the authority relied on for gambling contracts, the bill was filed for the cancelation of a bond which had been given for money lost at gaming, and to recover back a part payment which had been made on account of the bond. No opinion appears in the report of the case, but there were plain grounds of equitable jurisdiction in that case, for, if the plaintiff had sued at law, and recovered the money which he had paid on account, the bond, which was an illegal instrument, would have remained outstanding against him. In such cases we have recognized as recently as in Oppenheimer v. Levi, 96 Md. 296, 60 L. R. A. 729, 54 Atl. 74, the jurisdiction of equity to grant relief. Money lost at gaming could not be recovered at common law. The statute of 9 Anne, which is relied on in Gough v. Pratt, only authorized the recovery of money lost at gaming in "an action of debt," although it required anyone liable "to be sued" under the statute to answer a bill of discovery filed in aid of the action of debt for discovering the money or thing lost at gaming. Our own Code (art. 27, § 127) authorizes the recovery of money lost at gaming "as if it were a common debt." Certainly nothing in either of these statutes confers jurisdiction on equity to entertain proceedings for the recovery of such debts, when unaccompanied by special circumstances which render a court of law inadequate to grant relief. There is no contention that the bill in the present case was filed for discovery, and we have already expressed our views upon the inadequacy of the facts relied on in it as affording special grounds for the equitable relief for which it asks. The decision in Gough v. Pratt has been several times affirmed by this court, but in no case, so far as we are aware, has the proposition that one, having lost money at gaming, may elect whether to proceed at law or in equity for its recovery, been the subject of approval by us; nor are we aware of any case in which this court has upheld a court of equity in giving effect directly or indirectly to the terms of an illegal contract at the suit of a voluntary party to that contract. The cases of Morgan v. Beaumont, 121 Mass. 7; Mount v. Waite, 7 Johns. 434, and Vischer v. Yates, 11 Johns. 23, relied on by the appellee in support of his motion, were cases at law, and cannot be regarded as controlling precedents upon the question of equitable jurisdiction which we have considered in the present case. The case of Petillon v. Hipple, 90 Ill. 420, 32 Am. Rep. 31, also relied on in support of the motion, was a bill in equity "to restrain the enforcement of an unexecuted contract founded on a wager," and it was upon that express ground that the court assumed jurisdiction of the controversy. The case is, in our judgment, entirely consistent with the position assumed by us in the present one.

The motion for reargument will be overruled. All judges present, except Boyd and Page, JJ.

MERCHANTS' BRIDGE TERMINAL RAILWAY COMPANY, Resp't.

(.....Mo.....)

1. A track erected on pillars from 15 to 25 feet above the surface of the street for carrying railroad trains is inconsistent with the use of the place as a public street, and, although title to the fee is in the public, an abutting owner may enjoin the use of such track until compensation is made for the injury thereby inflicted on him.
2. The construction in a public street of an elevated railroad track for the use of trains to be operated by steam, so as to interfere with the abutting owner's right to light, air, access, and privacy, is a taking of his property for which, under the Constitution, he is entitled to compensation.
3. The statute of limitations begins to run against a right of action to recover for the injury inflicted upon abutting property by the erection of a permanent structure in the street for the operation of railroad trains upon an elevated track at the time the structure is completed and permanent injury inflicted.

(December 23, 1908.)

A PPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Circuit Court for the City of St.

Louis in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for injury to plaintiffs' property by reason of the construction and operation of an elevated railroad track in the adjoining street. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Sale & Sale and David Goldsmith, for appellants:

Abutting owners are entitled to compensation for damage to their property, occasioned by the construction and operation of a railroad in a public street, when the railroad is not constructed upon the grade of the street.

Mr. M. N. Sale, also for appellants:

Property in a determinate object is composed of certain constituent elements, to wit: The unrestricted right of use, enjoyment, and disposal of that object. It follows from this premise that anything which destroys or subverts any of the essential elements aforesaid is a taking or destruction pro tanto of the property, though the possession and power of disposal of the land remain undisturbed, and though there be no actual or 64 L. physical invasion of the locus in quo. The use of a given object is the most essential and beneficial quality or attribute of property; without it other elements which go to make up property would be of no avail. If the city were allowed to deprive the defendant of the use of his entire lot, it would leave in his hands but a barren and barmecidal title; and what is true of property rights as an integer is true of each fractional portion.

Mr. John H. Overall, for respondent:

Legislative authority over the streets of St. Louis is in the city.

O'Connor v. Pittsburgh, 18 Pa. 187.

There is full legislative authority in the city of St. Louis to permit the use of its streets for the construction, maintenance, and operation of a railway, and such use does not subject such streets to a new servitude inconsistent with and subversive of their proper use as streets.

Gantt, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action by plaintiffs, who are abutting owners of real estate on Front street, in the city of St. Louis, for damages to their said realty occasioned by and resulting from the construction and operation of an elevated steam commercial railroad along and over said Front street in front of plaintiffs' lots. In the circuit court a demurrer to the petition was sustained on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The propriety of that action by the circuit court presents the sole and only question for our determination at this time.

Omitting caption, the plaintiffs allege that the defendant is a railroad corporation, engaged as a common carrier, operating a steam railroad with locomotives and cars, at and in the city of St. Louis; that plaintiffs are now, and for many years have been, the owners in fee simple of a lot in city block 5, fronting 76 feet on the west line of Wharf or Front street, in the city of St. Louis, with a depth of 75 feet, on which lot there were at all the times mentioned in the petition, and now are, erected three substantial four-story brick buildings, known as Nos. 203, 204, and 205 South Levee or Front street; that plaintiffs acquired the said lot and premises prior to the year 1890, and have owned and occupied the same by themselves and their tenants continuously since April, 1890; that said Front street, known as the "Levee or Wharf," is, and was for many years prior to the construction of defendant's said railway as hereafter set out, a public street and highway of the city of St. Louis, and held by said city in trust for the maintenance thereof, as public streets are generally used and maintained; that plaintiffs were and are seised of an easement in said street, and are entitled to have the same kept and used as a public highway, and to be protected from unusual and extraordinary interferences with the light, air, and access to and use of their premises not occasioned by ordinary street uses; that, as an incident and appurtenant to plaintiffs' ownership of said premises, plaintiffs, at least until condemnation, compensation, or purchase, have and had in said Front street the right and easement to its free and unimpaired use, for the uses and ordinary purposes of a public street or highway, and to exemption from noise, smoke, soot, dust, cinders, obstructions, and unusual impairment of the easements of light, air, and access and ingress and egress to and from said premises, etc.; that defendant's structure, and the operation of its engines and cars on said street, in front of plaintiffs' premises, are of a permanent and continuous nature.

The petition avers that the railroad of the defendant was an elevated road, the superstructure of which rested upon iron columns, which were erected perpendicularly to a height of from 15 to 25 feet above the surface of the street or sidewalk; that these columns supported cross-girders or framework, upon which were laid four single railroad tracks, or two double railroad tracks, and that the railroad of the defendant has ever since the erection of the structure been, and still is, operated upon these tracks, and that the superstructure extends out on either side, so that the western line thereof approaches the eastern or building line of plaintiffs' premises within 12 feet, more or less; that these structures are of a permanent nature, and are built and intended by the defendant to be used permanently for the transportation of freight and passengers; "that large numbers of freight and passenger trains daily pass in front of plaintiffs' premises, and produce a flickering and darkening of the light, and deprive and have hitherto deprived plaintiffs of the beneficial use of such light as comes to said premises, and interferes with the air, ventilation, and access to said premises, and the privacy thereof; that said structure, as it now exists, and as above described, has been erected and maintained without legal right, and is a special injury to plaintiffs and their premises; that the operation of said railroad is not an ordinary street use of said street authorized by law; that on the road thus constructed the defendant every day ran, and still does run, many trains of cars; that said railroad and structure greatly obstructed, and still do greatly obstruct, said premises and the passageway to and from said buildings; that they excluded, and still do exclude light and air from the same; that the trains made, and still do make, loud and disagreeable noises, caused, and still do cause, vibrations of the buildings erected on said premises, whereby the security of such buildings is greatly impaired and their strength lessened, and injured, and still do injure, said buildings, and said trains and said structures injure and impair plaintiffs' easements of light, air, and access; that the value of the use and occupation of said premises has thereby been greatly damaged."

The petition further avers that the aforesaid structure and the railroad of the defendant impose a new and additional burden on the property of the plaintiffs, and one which was not within the power of the city of St. Louis to authorize, without compensating plaintiffs for their property thus taken and damaged; that no compensation has ever been made for the aforesaid taking and damage of plaintiffs' property; that the rental of value of said property has been greatly damaged, to wit, to the extent of $2,500 per annum, by the construction and operation of defendant's railroad in said street; and that the property itself has been permanently damaged, in the sum of $25,000.

That the city of St. Louis did heretofore, to wit, on July 9, 1887, adopt an ordinance which undertook to authorize the construction of defendant's railroad, and the use of the streets therefor, which said ordinance is set forth in full in the petition, and which, among other things, required the construction of said railroad to be commenced within one year after the approval of the ordinance, and to be completed within five years from February 3, 1887, and which said ordinance was subsequently amended by another ordinance, approved December 21, 1889; that the defendant, with the view of availing itself of the provision of said ordinance, and claiming to act under the same, has constructed its road as aforesaid; and that said ordinance is in conflict with article 2, § 21, of the Constitution of this state, and also in conflict with article 2, § 30, of the Constitution of this state, and also in conflict with the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States; "that 64 L. R. A.

plaintiffs' property has been taken and damaged for the uses of defendant's railroad as herein set out, without just compensation; that plaintiffs have been deprived of their property by the defendant, without due process of law;" and that the construction of the railroad of the defendant was completed in May, 1890, and the railroad been operated ever since that time; and that the operation of the road will continue, unless restrained by order of this court.

The petition then prays that the damages of the plaintiffs may be ascertained and determined, and that they may have judgment therefor, to wit, for the sum of $25,000; also that the defendant may be enjoined from further obstructing and encumbering the aforesaid street, and also from maintaining, continuing, or operating its railroad and structure in front of the premises of the plaintiffs; and further be required to remove said structure in front of plaintiffs' property, unless, within such time as should be fixed by the court, the defendant pay to plaintiffs a sum of money sufficient to compensate the plaintiffs for their property taken, and for the permanent injury and damage done thereto, by reason of the aforesaid acts of the defendant.

It is stated by counsel that the action of the trial court in sustaining the demurrer to the petition of the plaintiffs was predicated exclusively on the theory that the cause of action of the plaintiffs was barred by the statute of limitations, in that it appeared from the face of the petition that the action was not instituted within five years after the completion of the defendant's railway; but this is not disclosed in the record, and we cannot take notice of the reasons which moved the circuit court to sustain the demurrer.

1. As said by Judge Andrews, for the court of appeals of New York, in Kane v. New York Elev. R. Co. 125 N. Y. 175, 11 L. R. A. 640, 28 N. E. 278: "Few questions have come before the courts in this generation of greater practical importance, or involving larger pecuniary interests, than those growing out of the construction of railways in city streets. Whether such streets may, under legislative and municipal authority, be occupied by railroad tracks to the inconvenience of abutting owners without making compensation, and what limitation, if any, there is to the legislative power over streets which cannot be transgressed without violating the legal and constitutional rights of lot owners, are questions which have excited the gravest debate, and have been the subject of the most careful judicial consideration."

Rorer on Railroads, p. 518, says that, as to the right of a railroad to run along a public street without additional compensation, "American authorities differ so widely that it is impossible to lay down any positive rule of law upon the subject."

A résumé of the decisions of this court on this subject will greatly aid us in arriving at a proper conclusion. The easement of the plaintiffs in Front street is too firmly established to admit of doubt.

In the case of Henry Gaus & Sons Mfg. Co. v. St. Louis, K. & N. W. R. Co. 113 Mo., on page 315, 18 L. R. A. 339, 35 Am. St. Rep. 706, 20 S. W. 658, MacFarlane, J., says: "It must be conceded by the defendant, because it is too well settled to admit of question, that every owner of a lot abutting on a public street, besides the ownership of the property itself, has rights appurtenant thereto, which form a part of the estate. Those rights are said to be 'as much property as the lot itself.' Of these may be named an easement for the free admission of light and pure air, and the right of ingress and egress to and from his property. . . . 'Every lot owner has a "peculiar interest in the adjacent street, which neither the local nor the general public can pretend to claim; a private right in the nature of an incorporeal hereditament, legally attached to his contiguous ground, an incidental title to certain facilities and franchises," which is in the nature of property, and which can no more be appropriated against his will than any tangible property of which he may be the owner.' Depriving the owners of these incorporeal hereditaments, or interfering with their full enjoyment by appropriating the street to a new and different public use to that originally contemplated, would undoubtedly be a damage within the foregoing constitutional provision. . . . We think a public use which would interfere with these incorporeal rights, whereby the property was depreciated in value, would be a damage to the property within the meaning of the Constitution, and would entitle the owner to compensation." To the same effect: Knapp, Stout & Co. v. St. Louis Transfer R. Co. 126 Mo. 35, 28 S. W. 627; Sherlock v. Kansas City Belt R. Co. 142 Mo. 182, 64 Am. St. Rep. 551, 43 S. W. 629; Egerer v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 130 N. Y. 108, 14 L. R. A. 381, 29 N. E. 95; Sperb v. Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. 137 N. Y. 155, 20 L. R. A. 752, 32 N. E. 1050.

In some of the states the right of the abutting owner to compensation by reason of the construction of a steam railroad in front of his premises has been made to depend on whether the fee in the street was located in the municipality or the abutting owners; but in this state the right of the owner of a lot in a city or town to the use of the street and to damages for its obstruction does not depend on his ownership of any of the soil under the street. His right flows from the fact that his lot abuts on a public highway. Lackland v. North Missouri R. Co. 31 Mo. 187.

At an early day in the judicial history of this state it was ruled that the laying of tracks and the operation of a steam railroad on the grade of a public street or highway did not constitute a new or additional servitude, and did not warrant compensation for damages resulting to the owners of abutting property. While this is true, as was said by this court in Knapp, Stout & Co. v. St. Louis Transfer R. Co. 126 Mo., loc. cit. 36, 28 S. W. 627, it was "a modified rule," "a rule that has been hedged about with many qualifications."

Thus, in the very first case (Lackland v. North Missouri R. Co. 31 Mo. 188) it was said: "We have not observed any case, even where this power is conceded, which allows the erection of depots or car buildings or any other structures which materially obstruct the use of the street or highway as a public easement." In that case it appeared that the company built a side track along the main track in the street fronting the plaintiff's lot, and a switch track connecting the two others; that these tracks rested on embankments which of themselves entirely obstructed all passage of vehicles over any part of the street. In addition to the three tracks, two switch frames and a catlélway had also been erected. The side track was used for a standing place of freight and passenger cars. In short, the street was used as a depot yard. Judge Napton, in the course of the opinion referred to the decision of the supreme court of Pennsylvania in Com. v. Erie & N. E. R. Co. 27 Pa. 351, 67 Am. Dec. 471, a court which has maintained at all times the absolute control of the state over all its highways, wherein it was ruled that a grant of right of way over and along streets, highways, etc., but with the restriction "not to obstruct or impede their free use," did not authorize the company to place any material obstructions in the streets or highways, and any change of grade, unless the road or street was adapted to the new grade at the expense of the company, was unauthorized; and this court, in said Lackawanna Case, affirmed a judgment for damages growing out of the said acts of the railway company.

In Porter v. North Missouri R. Co. 33 Mo. 128, the opinion proceeded on the ground that the plaintiff's access to his property was not affected by the construction of the road at grade.

In Tate v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 64 Mo. 149, the Porter Case came under review, and it was held that the principles announced therein only applied to a railroad constructed on the grade of the street, where the only obstruction is the passage of trains, and not where embankments have been made above the grade, or where the street is used for side tracks or other structures for the convenience of the railroad; and, accordingly, in the Tate Case damages were allowed the abutting owner where the railroad company built an embankment in the street in front of the plaintiff's lot. To the same effect is Swenson v. Lexington, 69 Mo. loc. cit. 166; Cross v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co. 77 Mo., loc. cit. 322; Smith v. Kansas City, St. J. & O. B. R. Co. 98 Mo. 24, 11 S. W. 259; Dubach v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 89 Mo. 488, 1 S. W. 86.

In Schopp v. St. Louis, 117 Mo. 131, 20 L. R. A. 783, 22 S. W. 898, this court held that an abutting owner on a street has equal right with the public to use the street, and, in addition thereto, he has certain rights which are special to himself, e. g., that of ingress and egress; and that the city had no power to lease spaces on a street, in front of business houses, for produce dealers. Judge Black, speaking for the court, speaking of the building of market houses in the streets of a city, quotes Judge Dillon to the effect that "they are nuisances when built upon the streets, although sufficient space be left for the passage of vehicles and persons" (Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 383), and says "the public highways belong from side to side, and end to end, to the public," and "the public are entitled, not only to a free passage along the highway, but to a free passage along any portion of it not in the actual use of some other traveler"; and the abutting property owner has the right to the free and unobstructed passage to and from his property."

In Lockwood v. Wabash R. Co. 122 Mo. 86, 24 L. R. A. 516, 43 Am. St. Rep. 547, 26 S. W. 698, it was pointed out that § 2543, Rev. Stat. 1889, now § 1035, Rev. Stat. 1899, provides that, when a railroad builds its tracks in a public street by permission of the city authorities, it must restore the street to its former state, or to such a state as not necessarily to impair its usefulness, and that the mayor and assembly of the city are restricted in their grant by the Constitution and laws of the state. In that case, while the court felt constrained by the unbroken line of decisions to the effect that a city in this state may permit and authorize by ordinance the laying of a railroad track at grade along its streets, it held that this was not an unqualified power, and consequently ruled that, while the railroad was laid at grade, yet, owing to the narrowness of the street and the width of the tracks, the use of the street by the railroad company amounted to a monopoly and exclusive use of the street by the company, to the denial of the rights of abutting owners, and was in effect a taking and damaging their property without compensation, and accordingly affirmed the decree of the circuit court perpetually restraining the company from operating its cars and locomotives on said street.

In Knapp, Stout & Co. v. St. Louis Transfer R. Co. 126 Mo. 37, 28 S. W. 627, the Lockwood Case was approved, and this court, after reviewing all the above cases, perpetually enjoined the defendant railroad company from operating a switch track in Hall street, in St. Louis, in front of plaintiff's property, and on what would have been the west sidewalk had one been constructed. Judge Black, speaking for this court, said: "Taking these cases all in all, it is very clear a municipal corporation has no power to grant to a railroad company such use of a street as will destroy its usefulness as a public thoroughfare, or destroy or unreasonably interfere with the right of an abutting property holder to access to and from his property."

The petition in the present case presents sharply, for the first time in this court, the rights of an abutting owner to compensation for the new and additional servitude to which a street in front of his property has been subjected by the construction and operation of an elevated railroad thereon, on a permanent structure, such as is described in plaintiff's petition. Starting with the unquestioned easement which the plaintiffs have to light and air and access to and from their buildings, and the adjudications of this court already reviewed, can it be said that the proposition is stare decisis, and plaintiffs are precluded from recovering compensation because the defendant's railroad is not a new or additional servitude? Our opinion is that there is nothing in our decisions up to this time that precludes a recovery, and the point is before us for adjudication in the light of reason and the analogies of the law.

The question is not a new one in our sister states. Thus, in New York the question arose in Story v. New York Elev. R. Co. 90 N. Y. 122, 43 Am. Rep. 146. The case is notable, not only on account of the question involved and the thoroughness with which it was considered, but the ability of the counsel who argued it. In that case the trial court found that the structure of the elevated railroad in that case would to some extent obscure the light of the abutting premises; that the passing trains would do this also, and would impair the usefulness of the plaintiff's premises; that the line of columns abridges the sidewalks, and interferes with the street as a thoroughfare where such columns are located; that the fronts of the buildings will be exposed to observation from passengers in passing trains, and their privacy invaded; and these things will be of a continuing character. We quote this finding because it is practically the very things of which plaintiffs in this case complain. Danforth, J., who delivered the majority opinion, assumed as the basis of his opinion that the fee to the street was in the city, and thus in this respect the opinion is in harmony with our own on this subject, viz., that, irrespective of the title in the street, the abutter had the easement of air and light and access to and from the street, until by legal process and upon just compensation it was taken from him. While conceding that a railroad on grade was not a new servitude, the court said: "Can the street be lawfully appropriated to such a structure [as this] without making compensation to the plaintiff for his easement therein? This is a question of power. If the legislature has power to authorize such a structure without compensation its exercise cannot be regulated by the courts. If one road may be authorized to be constructed upon two series of iron columns placed in the street, another may be authorized to be supported upon brick columns or upon brick arches spanning the street. If a superstructure may be authorized which spans the entire carriage way at 15 feet above the bed of the street, one may be authorized which spans the entire street from building to building, thus excluding light and air from the street and from the property abutting thereon. Thus an open street would be converted into a covered way, and so filled with columns or other permanent structures as to be practically impassable for vehicles." Tracy, J., concurring, further said: "The argument has been pressed upon our attention with great ability, that as railroads, like streets, are intended to facilitate trade and commerce, and lands taken for either are taken for public use, the legislature may, in its discretion, appropriate the public streets of our cities to the use of railroad corporations, and this without reference to the form of their structure, or the extent of the injury wrought upon property abutting thereon. This is a startling proposition, and one well calculated to fill the owners of such property with alarm. It cannot be that the vast property abutting on the streets of our great cities is held by so feeble a tenure. This court has repeatedly held that such a rule has no application where the abutting owner owns the fee of the bed of the street; and we are of opinion that in cases where the public has taken the fee, but in trust to be used as a public street, no structure upon the street can be authorized that is inconsistent with the continued use of the same as an open public street. The obligation to preserve it as an open street rests in contract written in the statute under which the lands were taken, and which may not be violated by the exercise of any legislative discretion. Whatever force the argument may have as applied to railroads built upon the surface of the street, without change of grade, and where the road is so constructed that the public is not excluded from any part of the street, it has no force when applied to a structure like that authorized in the present case. The answer to the argument is that lands taken for a particular public use cannot be appropriated to a different use without further compensation; that the authority attempted to be conferred by the legislature upon the defendant to take exclusive possession of portions of the public street, and to erect a series of iron columns on either side thereof, upon which a superstructure is to be erected spanning the street, and filling the roadway at 15 feet above the surface, thus excluding light and air from the adjoining premises, is an attempt to appropriate the street to a use essentially inconsistent with that of a public street, and, in respect to the land in question, violates the covenant of the city made with the plaintiff's grantor, and, in respect to lands acquired under the act of 1813, violates the trust for which such lands are held for public use." The conclusion was that an abutting owner had an easement in the street which constitutes private property of which he cannot be deprived without compensation.

Such a structure as that described in plaintiffs' petition is inconsistent with the use of Front street as a public street, and the plaintiff was entitled to an injunction until compensation had been paid therefor.

In Lahr v. Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. 104 N. Y. 288, 10 N. E. 528, the court of appeals expressed the opinion that the defense had been conducted with a view to have the Story Case overruled or limited. The court reaffirmed the Story Case, and deduced therefrom the following principles: "We hold that the Story Case has definitely determined: First. That an elevated railroad in the streets of a city, operated by steam power, and constructed, as to form, equipments, and dimensions, like that described in the Story Case, is a perversion of the use of the street from the purposes originally designed for it, and is a use which neither the city authorities nor the legislature can legalize or sanction, without providing compensation for the injury inflicted upon the property of abutting owners. Second. That abutters upon a public street . . . acquire an easement in the bed of the street for ingress and egress to and from their premises, and also for the free and uninterrupted passage and circulation of light and air through and over such street, for the benefit of property situated thereon. Third. That the ownership of such easement is an interest in real estate constituting property within the meaning of that term as used in the Constitution of the state, and requires compensation to be made therefor before it can lawfully be taken from its owner for public use. Fourth. That the erection of an elevated railroad, the use of which is intended to be permanent, in a public street, and upon which cars are propelled by steam engines generating gas, steam, and smoke, and distributing in the air cinders, dust, ashes, and other noxious and deleterious substances, and interrupting the free passage of light and air to and from adjoining premises, constitute a taking of the easement, and its appropriation by a railroad corporation, rendering it liable to the abutters for the damages occasioned by such taking."

In Sheehy v. Kansas City Cable R. Co. 94 Mo. 574, 4 Am. St. Rep. 396, 7 S. W. 579, this court expressly approved the decision in Story v. New York Elev. R. Co. 90 N. Y. 122, 43 Am. Rep. 146, saying "that a railroad company which had the right conferred on it to alter the grade of the street for the purpose of constructing its road would also be liable to an abutting property owner for damages to his property by reason of such alteration. In such case the privilege granted the railroad 'would be yoked with a liability.' That the owner of property abutting on a street has such an easement therein as would support an action for damages peculiar to him is sustained by the following cases: Lackland v. North Missouri R. Co. 31 Mo. 181; Story v. New York Elev. R. Co. 90 N. Y. 122, 43 Am. Rep. 146."

In Doane v. Lake Street Elev. R. Co. 165 Ill. 510, 36 L. R. A. 97, 56 Am. St. Rep. 265, 46 N. E. 520, while denying a remedy by injunction on the ground that the city of Chicago was the owner of the fee in its streets, and was empowered to permit the railroad company to build an elevated street railway therein, the decision throughout recognizes the right of an abutting owner to damages at law, and, because he had a complete legal remedy for the damages resulting to him as an abutting owner, relief in equity was denied.

In Rude v. St. Louis, 93 Mo. 413, 6 S. W. 258, this court, after reviewing the prior cases in this court on this question, said: "These cases recognize the right of a railroad company to lay down and use its track upon a street when that right is conferred upon it by the municipality, the municipality having the power delegated to it to grant that right; still the track must be laid upon the grade of the street, and the railroad so used as not to unreasonably deprive the owner of the property of the use of the street."

From these cases we deduce the following propositions: First. The owner of property abutting on a public street or highway in this state has an easement in such street of air, light, and access to and from his property by said street, whether the fee to the same is in the municipality or the abutting owners, and this easement is property of which he cannot be deprived without just compensation. Second. That the construction and maintenance of a steam or street railroad on the grade of such street in pursuance of municipal authority, the municipal corporation having power to grant it, is not a new or additional servitude on the land upon which the street is constructed, but falls within the use contemplated when the street was laid out or acquired by the public. Porter v. North Missouri R. Co. 33 Mo. 137. Third. That the power of a city or other municipal corporation in Missouri to authorize the construction of railroads in the public streets is "a modified right," a right hedged about with many qualifications; that it does not include the right to grant a railroad the exclusive use of the surface of a street, even when laid at grade. Lockwood v. Wabash R. Co. 122 Mo. 86, 24 L. R. A. 516, 43 Am. St. Rep. 547, 26 S. W. 698; Sherlock v. Kansas City Belt R. Co. 142 Mo. 172, 64 Am. St. Rep. 551, 43 S. W. 629; Knapp, Stout & Co. v. St. Louis Transfer R. Co. 126 Mo. 26, 28 S. W. 627; Schulenburg & B. Lumber Co. v. St. Louis, K. & N. W. R. Co. 129 Mo. 455, 31 S. W. 796; Corby v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 150 Mo. 457, 52 S. W. 282. Neither can the municipal authorities grant to a railroad company such use of a street as will destroy or unreasonably interfere with the right of an abutting property holder to access to or egress from his property, or deprive him of his easement of light and air from the street. The street on which a railroad is constructed on the grade cannot be used for side tracks, the storing of cars, for water tanks, or like structures. Lackland v. North Missouri R. Co. 31 Mo. 180; Tate v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 64 Mo. 149; Spencer v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 120 Mo. 154, 22 L. R. A. 668, 23 S. W. 126. Fourth. That the right to construct a railroad in a public street at grade, by authority of municipal grant, has been too long acquiesced in, and too many rights have been vested on the faith of the decisions affirming such right, to question such a right to acquire on the faith of such adjudication. Fifth. That whether an elevated railroad constructed on permanent pillars or arches in the street so as to shut out the light and air of abutting owners and interfere with the free use of the street and their access to and from their premises is not a new and additional servitude, one not in the contemplation when the street was acquired or laid out, is an open question in this state, and one which we are at liberty to decide on reason and the analogies of the law.

On the part of plaintiff, we are not asked to reverse the unbroken line of decisions in this state which hold that a steam or street railroad constructed and maintained on the grade of a street, by authority of municipal authority duly delegated, is not a new and additional servitude; neither is it insisted that the municipal authority may not grant an elevated railroad the right to occupy a street, subject to its liability to pay abutting owners damages for injuries to their easement as abutters on such street. But they do contend that this court has not gone to the extent of holding that an elevated railroad, built on permanent structures in a public street which interfere with and deprive the owners of their easement of free access to and from buildings, and deprive them of light and air, is not an additional servitude, and one not contemplated when the street was established and laid out. They insist that the logic and reasoning of our decisions, on the contrary, lead to the conclusion that such structures as those described in their petition are inconsistent with the original dedication of the street, and are such an injury to the abutting property owners as entitles them to damages therefor. On the other hand, defendants assert that the construction of an elevated street or steam railroad on a street differs from one constructed on the grade of the street in degree only, and not in principle; that the principle upon which our decisions holding that a railroad built in the grade is not a new servitude is not that they do not in fact inconvenience and damage the abutting owners, and depreciate their property, but is that the city has the right to apply the street to any public service which will not destroy it as a highway or as a means of egress or ingress to and from the abutting property, and that all other resulting damages are only such as were contemplated in the original dedication of the highway, whether by donation, purchase, or condemnation; that a long freight train passing on grade might make as much noise, emit as much smoke, and raise as much dust as a train on an elevated road; and that an elevated road does not destroy the street as much as a surface road.

That the expression that "a city may authorize a steam railroad to be built on the grade of a street" is not a careless one, we think, every decision of this court in which it is used will demonstrate. It is used advisedly, and in contradistinction to a road built on an embankment or in an excavation. As said by Judge Black, the right to build a steam railroad in a street is "hedged about with many qualifications," and one is "that, if built otherwise than on the grade, it is an unwarranted interference with a highway dedicated to the use of the traveling public, and with the rights of property owners abutting thereon."

In the Story Case, 90 N. Y. 122, 43 Am. Rep. 146, the distinction was made between a surface railroad and an elevated road on a public street. In the former, no part of the street was rendered impossible of passage with any vehicle or by any wayfarer or traveler. There was nothing exclusive in its use of the street. The rails, being on grade, did not obstruct the passage of any other vehicle along or across the tracks, and the delay by the passage of trains no greater than that occasioned by vehicles and carriages of private citizens, to which, of course, every person using the streets must submit; whereas an elevated railroad, built and constructed on a superstructure supported by heavy and permanent pillars of iron, stone, or brick, constitutes a permanent perversion of the use of the street, in that the space it occupies with the pillars is permanently diverted from use by the public, to which it was originally dedicated to the exclusive use of the railroad, and deprives the public of that free and unobstructed use of the street "from end to end" and "from side to side" to which it is entitled, and seriously impairs the easement of free and uninterrupted passage and circulation of light and air to which abutting owners are entitled.

The doctrine thus announced has been adhered to in all the subsequent cases in New York. Lahr Case, 104 N. Y. 288, 10 N. E. 528; Kane Case, 125 N. Y. 164, 11 L. R. A. 640, 26 N. E. 278.

In Fobes Case, 121 N. Y. 505, 8 L. R. A. 453, 24 N. E. 919, Judge Peckham reviewed the Story Case, and pointed out that prior to the Story Case that court had held, as we have held in Missouri, that a surface railroad was not a new servitude, and that as to surface railroads the Story Case did not overrule or change the law in regard to railroads laid on the grade, but "embodied the application of what was regarded as well-established principles of law to a new combination of facts, such facts amounting, as was determined, to an absolute and permanent obstruction in a portion of the public street, and in a total and exclusive use of such portion by the defendant; and such permanent obstruction and total and exclusive use, it was further held, amounted to a taking of some portion of plaintiff's easement in the street for the purpose of furnishing light, air, and access to his adjoining lot. . . . The structure, by the mere fact of its existence in the street, permanently and at every moment of the day took away from plaintiff some portion of the light and air which otherwise would have reached him, and, in a degree very appreciable, interfered with and took away from him his facility of access to his lot; such interference not being intermittent, and caused by the temporary use of the street by the passage of the vehicles of the defendant while it was operating its road through the street, but caused by the iron posts and by the superstructure imposed thereon, and existing for every moment of the day and night. Such a permanent, total, exclusive, and absolute appropriation of a portion of the street as this structure amounted to was held illegal and wholly beyond any legitimate or lawful use of a public street." He says, further on: "In the Story Case it was argued that no real distinction in principle existed between a steam surface and an elevated railroad resting on such a structure as was proved in that case." "This court, however, made the distinction," and held "that it was so real and tangible in fact as to call for a different judgment than would have been proper and appropriate in the case of the ordinary steam surface railroad." What was then said was reasserted in Sperb v. Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. 137 N. Y. 155, 20 L. R. A. 752, 32 N. E. 1050, and in which it was added: "The doctrine of the elevated railway cases has been of steady and consistent growth, since its rise in the decision of the Story Case." The last-mentioned case was decided by a divided court, but all of that court had subsequently concurred in that doctrine. When it is considered that the court of appeals of New York held, and still holds, just as this court has always held, that a surface railroad is not a new servitude on the street, but distinguishes an elevated from a surface railroad, its opinions are entitled to great consideration on a question which originated in that state, because the city of New York was the first to authorize an elevated road on its public streets. Upon fundamental principles as to the right of easement by the abutting property owners, the nature and purpose of a public street, and the permanent and obvious nature of the injury to the abutting property by the construction of such a structure as plaintiffs describe in their petition, we think the distinction between the fitful, intermittent use of a street by a surface railroad, and the permanent exclusive use of the same by an elevated railroad, shutting out the air and light and interfering with that free access which every abutting owner has to and from the street, is too plain to be obscured or disregarded, and that it is pro tanto a taking of plaintiffs' easement within the meaning of our Constitution and laws, and entitles them to compensation therefor.

It is true that some very able courts and law writers, notably the supreme court of Minnesota in Lamm v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 45 Minn. 78, 10 L. R. A. 268, 47 N. W. 455, and Wood v. Railroad, 45 Minn. 778 [1 Wood, Railroads, Minor's ed. p. 798?], find difficulty in reconciling the doctrine of the Story Case with the former decisions of the New York court as to surface railroads; but it seems to us that the essential difference is that urged by Judge Danforth, to wit, "the change of grade by permanent structures which result in the injury to or destruction of the abutting owner's easement." Were it a new question, we would be greatly inclined to say that a steam railroad emitting steam, smoke, and cinders in front of an abutter's property was a servitude never contemplated in the establishment of the street, but the rule to the contrary, as already said, has been too long maintained, and too many rights have been vested on the faith of it, for us now to disturb it, but there is no sound argument or reason, in our opinion, for extending it ~~one~~ whit further than we have heretofore gone.

Our conclusion is that the plaintiffs state a good cause of action, and one entitling them to damages, irrespective of §§ 6116 and 6117, Rev. Stat. 1899, which, in our opinion, did not change the law as to railroads constructed on the grade or surface of the street, as was ruled in Ruckert v. Grand Ave. R. Co. 163 Mo. 260, 63 S. W. 814, and Nagel v. Lindell R. Co. 167 Mo. 89, 66 S. W. 1090.

2. But conceding that plaintiffs had a cause of action, the question arises, on the face of the petition, whether that action is not barred by our statute of limitations. The defendant's structure is of a permanent character, and the injury to plaintiffs' property was susceptible of ascertainment when the said superstructure and railroad was completed in 1890, as alleged in the petition. In Howard County v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 130 Mo. 652, 32 S. W. 651, this court said: "While there is some conflict between the American cases on this subject, the rule, sustained by the great weight of authority, seems to be that when by wrongful acts a permanent nuisance is created and the injury therefrom is direct, immediate, and complete, so that the damages can be immediately measured in a single action, the statute will begin to run from the erection of the nuisance. On the other hand, when the injury, as in this case, is not complete, so that the damages can be measured at the time of the creation of the nuisance in one action, but depends upon its continuance and the uncertain operation of the seasons or of the forces set in motion by it, the statute will not begin to run until actual damage has resulted therefrom;" citing cases; among others, James v. Kansas, 83 Mo. 567.

In James v. Kansas, 83 Mo. 567, it was said: "Where the damage is complete by the original act of trespass, the statute begins to run from that time." In this case the structure was permanent and complete in 1890. The theory of the plaintiffs is that they were entitled to damages for the construction of such permanent structure, and that theory is correct, and hence they were required to bring their action within five years after its completion. Their damages could have been estimated in one action at that time, and the five years' limitation must and does control. Rev. Stat. 1899, § 4273, cl. 4; Smith v. Sedalia, 152 Mo. 283, 48 L. R. A. 711, 53 S. W. 907. It followed that the plaintiffs were barred when they commenced their action, and on this ground alone the judgment of the Circuit Court must be, and is, affirmed.

Robinson, Ch. J., and Brace, Burgess, and Fox, JJ., concur in toto.

Marshall, J., concurring:

I concur in the result, and am of opinion that all steam railroads on a public street are an additional servitude, and, when constructed on the grade, necessarily destroy the street for ordinary street purposes; but the elevated roads are not as injurious to abutting property as grade roads, as is shown by the grade road on Poplar street, and the elevated road on Front street, in St. Louis. I am further of opinion that, if the matter as to surface steam roads was not settled by the doctrine of stare decisis, they ought not to be allowed on the streets of a city.

Valliant, J., dissenting:

This court has, in numerous decisions, beginning in 1862 with Porter v. North Missouri R. Co. 33 Mo. 128, and ending in 1902 with Nagel v. Lindell R. Co. 167 Mo. 89, 64 L. R. A.

66 S. W. 1090, said that it was lawful for a city to authorize the construction and operation of a railroad in a street, and that such a use of the street was not a new servitude. Under these decisions, street railroads and steam railroads have been constructed and operated in the streets of all the cities in this state, and in many instances the value of property abutting the streets so used has been destroyed or greatly impaired, yet the court has said that the owner of the property has no remedy. An elevated railroad in a street may, in point of fact, according to the particular circumstances, be more or less destructive of the value of the property than a surface road, but in point of law there is no difference between the right to subject the street to the servitude of a railroad on the surface and to that of a railroad on an elevated structure. If the one is not a new servitude, the other is not; the principle is the same in both cases. If the court is now of the opinion that its former decisions were wrong, it would be better now, at this late date, to say so. But as long as we uphold our former decisions, we cannot, in my opinion, with consistency, say that an elevated railroad is a new servitude.

For this reason I am unable to concur in the first paragraph of the opinion in this case.

1. To entitle one to recover damages for injuries negligently inflicted upon him by a magnetic healer from whom he is receiving treatment for disease he is not bound to show that the treatment received was not proper or usual in magnetic healing, but it is sufficient to show that it was not proper to be given in any case to one in plaintiff's condition at the time of receiving it.

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Henry County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for malpractice. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Harkless, O'Grady, & Cryslar, for appellants:

The instruction upon the measure of damages was clearly erroneous.

The plaintiff's instruction, to the effect that it was the duty of Krewsom to treat the defendant with ordinary skill, and such as an ordinary, skilful man would have used, was clearly erroneous.

The hypothetical questions to the physicians were erroneous.

Messrs. H. H. Blanton, C. G. Burton, and W. E. Owen, for respondent:

Even though we concede, for the sake of the argument, that the objection is sufficiently specific, and that the questions do call for opinions on the ultimate facts to be found by the jury, still such an objection is not valid.

Burgess, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action for damages for injuries alleged to have been sustained by plaintiff by reason of the negligent, careless, and unskilful treatment by one of the employees of defendants, "magnetic healers," under whose treatment she was at the time for some derangement of the stomach. The suit was brought in the circuit court of Vernon county, but thereafter, on the application of plaintiff, the venue was changed to the circuit court of Henry county, where, upon a trial before the court and a jury, plaintiff recovered a verdict and judgment in the sum of $7,500, from which defendants, after unavailing motion for a new trial, appeal.

The salient facts of the case are about as follows: In January, 1899, plaintiff had malarial fever, in consequence of which she was confined to her bed for about eight weeks. About the 10th of March next thereafter, as she had not recovered from the effects of the fever, Dr. Henry Evans, of Sedalia, where she then was, was called to attend and treat her. She, at that time, was in a very weak and debilitated condition; had some stomach trouble. She remained at Sedalia, under the care and treatment of Dr. Henry Evans, until May 1st, when he advised her to go to Eldorado Springs for her health. She went to Eldorado Springs, and remained there for about three weeks, and returned to Sedalia, where she remained under the care of Dr. Evans until the middle or latter part of June, 1899. She went to Eldorado Springs again about the 15th or 20th of June, and remained there about one week. About July 1st she went to Nevada, Missouri, to be treated for stomach trouble, at the institution kept and maintained by the defendants. On her arrival at defendants' institution she was directed to one Mallott, an employee of defendants called the "diagnostician" of their institution, for diagnosis of her case. Mallott diagnosed her case, and assigned her to A. L. Krewsom for treatment. Krewsom gave plaintiff a treatment each day for about one week, when she went again to Eldorado Springs, where she remained about one week, and returned to Nevada, and took treatments from Krewsom at said institution until August 13, 1899, when she took her last treatment from him. On the 13th day of August, 1899, A. L. Krewsom, while treating plaintiff at defendants' institution, placed her on her back on a padded table, and put one hand on her stomach and the other hand under her knees, and bent her so that her knees almost touched her breast. He then placed her on her stomach on the padded table, and put his left hand on the small of her back over her spine, and his right hand under her knees, and bent her legs up until she screamed with pain. These manipulations resulted in the following injuries: The ligaments connecting the backbone and hipbone were ruptured and torn, and the back and spine and pelvic organs were permanently injured. No one was present at the time these injuries were inflicted, excepting plaintiff and Mr. Krewsom, he having, a few days prior thereto, directed plaintiff's sister, who had been accompanying her to defendants' institution, to remain away, stating that the presence of a third person would probably prevent plaintiff taking the suggestions. From the moment of Mr. Krewsom's manipulations of plaintiff she suffered intensely and almost constantly for a number of weeks, with pains in the lower part of the back and through the hips, and finally her condition, on account of the injuries so inflicted, became such that it was necessary for her physician, Dr. Ammerman, to place her in a plaster of paris brace. Four days after she was injured by Krewsom she employed Dr. I. W. Ammerman, of Nevada, Missouri, to treat her, and on that day he made a cursory examination. Two or three days afterwards he made a thorough examination, and found her in the condition above described. On September 6, 1899, Drs. Priest and Buchanan, of Nevada, Missouri, in connection with Dr. Ammerman, made an examination of plaintiff, and on the 14th and 16th of September, 1899, Drs. Halley and Fulton, of Kansas City, Missouri, respectively, examined her while confined to her bed in Nevada, Missouri, with the results above set forth.

During the trial of the case all of the above physicians, as well as Drs. Evans, of Sedalia, and Gibbons and Shankland, of Clinton, made a thorough examination of plaintiff, and each of them testified to her injuries as above described, and that said injuries were permanent, and a majority of them testified that her life would be shortened thereby.

Plaintiff also read in evidence the deposition of Krewsom, wherein he admits that he manipulated plaintiff in the manner described by her, and at one time she complained that he hurt her.

Defendants did not offer any testimony as to the nature and extent of plaintiff's injuries, but introduced certain witnesses, residents of Nevada, who testified that they saw plaintiff indulge in certain calisthenic exercises, and to having gone buggy riding with Dr. Ammerman on several occasions after the time of the alleged injuries, and other evidence which tended to show that she had sustained no injury by reason of her treatment by Krewsom.

Over the objection and exception of defendants the court instructed the jury as follows: "(1) The court instructs the jury that the defendants admit that at the time of the alleged injury to plaintiff they were copartners. (2) The court instructs the jury that if you shall believe from the evidence that A. L. Krewsom was the agent, servant, or employee of defendants, and that, as such agent, servant, or employee, said A. L. Krewsom rendered treatment to plaintiff, then it was his duty to treat her with ordinary care and skill; and if you shall believe from the evidence that while he was treating her, as the agent, servant, or employee of defendants, he violently bruised, bent, twisted, or wrenched plaintiff's back or spine, and that such treatment was improper, and not such as an ordinary, careful, and skilful man would have given the plaintiff under the circumstances, you will find that defendants' treatment of the plaintiff by said A. L. Krewsom, as their agent, servant, and employee, was careless, negligent, and unskilful. (3) The court instructs the jury that if you shall believe from the evidence that A. L. Krewsom, as the agent, servant, and employee of the defendants, did carelessly, negligently, and unskilfully treat plaintiff, as defined in the previous instructions, and that by such treatment he did hurt, bruise, and injure plaintiff in and upon her back, spine, or pelvic organs, your verdict must be for the plaintiff. (4) The court instructs the jury that if from the evidence they find for the plaintiff, then, in estimating her damages, they will take into consideration the physical injury inflicted, if any, whether temporary or permanent, and the bodily pain and mental anguish endured, if any, by the plaintiff by reason of such injury, if any; and in assessing her damages you shall assess them at such a sum as you shall believe from the evidence will reasonably compensate her for said injury received, together with the suffering caused by reason of said injury, together with such reasonable sum as you shall believe, from the evidence, she has paid out or has become liable for on account of medical attention and treatment for 64 L. R. A.

said injury, not to exceed in the aggregate $50,000, as prayed for in plaintiff's petition.

(5) The court instructs the jury that under the law the plaintiff is not liable for any medical services rendered her by Drs. Halley and Fulton and Evans, and, in case you find for the plaintiff, in assessing damages you will not allow the plaintiff anything for such medical services."

The court, at the instance of the defendants, gave to the jury the following instructions, numbered 2, 3, and 5, as follows, to wit: "(2) The court instructs the jury that, although you may believe and find from the testimony that Mrs. Longan, the plaintiff, has received and suffered an injury to her back, yet, unless you can further find, from a greater weight of the testimony, that said injury was produced by treatment received from A. L. Krewsom on or about the 12th day of August, 1899, your verdict should be for the defendants. (3) The opinion of experts who have testified in this cause is testimony which the jury should consider and examine in connection with all the other testimony in this case, subject to the same rules of credit and disbelief as the testimony of other witnesses." "(5) The jury are instructed that they are the sole judges of the credibility of the witnesses and of the weight to be given to their testimony; and in determining such credibility and weight, they will take into consideration the character of the witness, his manner on the stand, his interest, if any, in the result of the trial, his relation to or feeling toward the parties, the probabilities or improbabilities of his statements, as well as all the facts and circumstances given in evidence. In this connection you are further instructed that, if you believe that any witness had knowingly and wilfully sworn falsely to any material fact, that you are at liberty to recall all or any portion of such witness's testimony."

The defendants asked the court to give instructions 4, 8, and 9, which were refused, and defendants excepted. "(1) The court instructs the jury that, if you find from the testimony that a person receiving the injury to their back such as claimed by the plaintiff to have been received at the hands of A. L. Krewsom, an employee of the defendants, would suffer great pain immediately following such injury, and that such pain would be severe and continuous thereafter, and you further find from the testimony that after August 12, 1899, to and during the first few days in September thereafter, she did not suffer or complain of pain in her back, then your verdict must be for the defendants." "(4) The court instructs the jury that the burden of proof in this case is on the plaintiff to prove her case by a preponderance of the evidence, and, unless you find and believe from a preponderance of the evidence that plaintiff has sustained the injuries complained of, and that she received such injuries at the hands of A. L. Krewsom, you will find for defendants." "(8) The court instructs the jury that before they can find for the plaintiff in this case they must find and believe, from a preponderance of the evidence, that plaintiff has sustained the injuries complained of in her petition, and said injuries were sustained at the hands of said A. L. Krewsom. (9) The court instructs the jury that, although you may find from the testimony that the plaintiff has received and sustained an injury to her back, before you can find a verdict for the plaintiff you must further find, from a preponderance of the testimony, that said injury was caused by A. L. Krewsom on or about the 12th day of August, 1899, although you may not be able from the testimony to find what caused said injury."

The court refused to give said instructions, numbered 1 and 4, but modified the same, and gave them as modified, which said instructions, as modified by the court, are as follows: "(1) The court instructs the jury that, if you find from the testimony that a person receiving the injury to their back such as claimed by the plaintiff to have been received at the hands of A. L. Krewsom, an employee of the defendants, would suffer great pain immediately following such injury, and that such pain would be severe and continuous thereafter, and you further find from the testimony that after August 12, 1899, to and during the first few days of September thereafter, she did not suffer or complain of pain in her back, then this is a fact which you should take into consideration in determining the fact whether or not the injury claimed to have been received by plaintiff was received at the time in the manner and by the means as claimed by her." "(4) The court instructs the jury that the burden of proof in this case is on the plaintiff to prove her case by a preponderance of the evidence, and, unless you find and believe from a preponderance of the evidence that plaintiff has sustained the injuries complained of, and that she received such injuries at the hands of A. L. Krewsom, you will find for the defendants. By preponderance of evidence, as in this and other instructions herein used, is not meant the greater number of witnesses, but the greater weight and credibility of all the evidence and facts and circumstances in evidence."

Defendants contend that, as plaintiff's action is based solely upon the negligent treatment of her, in order to constitute unskillful L. R. A.

fulness it devolved upon her to show that the kind and manner of treatment adopted was not proper or usual in magnetic healing, and that, as she failed to do so, she was not entitled to recover. If this action was being prosecuted upon the theory that defendants were physicians, or that magnetic healing was one of the recognized profession, there would be more force in this position, but it is not, but upon the ground that they held themselves out as magnetic healers, claiming and pretending to heal and cure all mental and physical ailments and disease of the human mind and body through some power which they possessed peculiar to themselves. Nor was it necessary, in order to their liability for injuries sustained by plaintiff, that they should have been, or claimed to be, practising physicians; but if they undertook to cure plaintiff of her maladies, and by the negligent or unskillful treatment of her either by themselves or their employees, and by reason of such treatment, she sustained the injuries sued for, she was entitled to recover, just the same as she would be entitled to recover damages for the negligent or unskillful performance of any other kind of contract. It is a legal truism that any person who is legally responsible for his conduct is liable for all damages suffered by another which are the proximate result of negligence, carelessness, or want of ordinary care; and the reasons which prevail in such cases are much more cogent in the case of a person who deals with health and life, instead of property. In the case of Nelson v. Harrington, 72 Wis. 591, 1 L. R. A. 719, 7 Am. St. Rep. 900, 40 N. W. 228, it is said: "One who holds himself out as a healer of diseases, and accepts employment as such, must be held to the duty of reasonable skill in the exercise of his vocation. Failing in this, he must be held liable for any damages proximately caused by unskillful treatment of his patient. This is simply applying the rule of liability to which all persons are subject who hold themselves out, and accept employment, as experts in any profession, art, or trade. The theory upon which an expert practises his profession, art, or trade, the sources from whence he derived his knowledge of it, the tools and appliances he employs in the exercise of his calling, his methods of work, are not controlling considerations. The courts pass no judgment upon these matters. they look only to results. Thus a person may rely entirely upon his genius or normal intuitions for some line of mechanical work, and hold himself out as an expert, and accept employment therein, without previous training or practice. The law holds him responsible if he does his work unskillfully, although he does the best he can. He takes the risk of the quality or accuracy of his genius or intuitions. On the same principle one who holds himself out as a medical expert, and accepts employment as a healer of disease, but who relies exclusively for diagnosis and remedies upon some occult influence exerted upon him, or some mental intuition received by him when in an abnormal condition, in like manner takes the risk of the quality or accuracy of such influence or intuition. If these move him so imperfectly or inaccurately that, although he pursues the course of treatment thus pointed out or indicated to him, he fails to treat the patient with reasonable skill, he is liable for the consequences. The only difference in the two cases is, the mechanic acts under normal, and the physician acts under abnormal, influence or intuitions. The law does not concern itself with the quality of the mechanic's genius, or with the reality or nature of such alleged occult influence or intuition which controls the physician in his treatment of his patient. It only takes cognizance of the question. Did the practitioner or expert render the service he undertook in a reasonably skilful manner? That question, as applied to the defendants, the jury, upon sufficient proofs, have answered in the negative." While it is true that the physicians who testified on the part of plaintiff did not claim or pretend to know anything about the practice of magnetic healing, they were nevertheless competent, from education and experience, to testify whether the treatment which plaintiff underwent was proper in any case, and especially in her condition. Simply because a person claims or pretends to possess certain powers of healing peculiar to himself is no reason why other persons, who do not claim such powers, but who know from education and practice, are not competent to judge whether the treatment administered was negligently or carelessly done. Otherwise any nonprofessional person might undertake to treat a certain disorder, and—if defendants' position be correct in law, it matters not how carelessly or negligently performed—because, forsooth, no one could be found of the same pretensions to testify with respect to such treatment, the injured person would be without remedy. The contention is, we think, untenable.

It is said that the damages awarded by the jury were excessive and the result of prejudice, passion, and bias. There seems to be no way by which it can be proved that in making a large verdict the jurors were controlled by improper influences, and therefore it can only be inferred when the verdict is so out of line with reason and justice as to shock the conscience and to satisfy the unbiased mind that it is not the result of fair and unprejudiced, consideration. To justify such an inference, the fact in evidence ought not to justify any other conclusion (Hollenbeck v. Missouri P. R. Co. 141 Mo. 97, 38 S. W. 723, 41 S. W. 887; Perrette v. Kansas City, 162 Mo. 238, 62 S. W. 448), and there is nothing disclosed by the record in this case which would justify us in holding that the verdict was not the result of fair and unbiased deliberation.

Defendants argue that instruction No. 4 given for plaintiff is erroneous, and to it is to be attributed the excessiveness of the verdict. This instruction is criticised upon the ground that it is so general and indefinite as to leave the jury a roving commission to do absolutely as they pleased in reference to the damages. No instruction was asked by defendants on the measure of damages. It requires but a casual reading of this instruction to show that it is not in accord with the rule announced in the case of Carpenter v. McDavitt, 53 Mo. App. 393, and kindred cases; but that case was overruled by the same court in the case of Haymaker v. Adams, 61 Mo. App. 581, and all other cases announcing the same rule were in effect overruled by the case of Browning v. Wabash Western R. Co. 124 Mo. 55, 24 S. W. 731, in which it is said: "The defendant asked no instruction on the measure of damages whatever. No attempt was made by it to point out the proper elements of damage in such cases, or to modify the general language of the instruction. The instruction is not erroneous in its general scope, and if, in the opinion of counsel for defendant, it was likely to be misunderstood by the jury, it was the duty of the counsel to ask the modifications and explanations, in an instruction embodying its views. The court is not required, in a civil case, to instruct on all questions, whether suggested or not, and, as there is nothing in the amount of the verdict to indicate that the jury were actuated by any improper motive in their assessment, the general nature of the instruction is no ground for reversal." The instruction is good as far as it goes, and, if defendants desired to restrict plaintiff's right to recover to more limited bounds than were covered by the instruction, they should have asked an instruction to that effect. Roberston v. Wabash R. Co. 152 Mo. 383, 53 S. W. 1082; Harmon v. Donohoe, 153 Mo. 263, 54 S. W. 453; Mattheus v. Missouri P. R. Co. 142 Mo. 645, 44 S. W. 802. Wheeler v. Bowles, 163 Mo. 398, 63 S. W. 675, was an action for damages alleged to have been sustained by the malpractice of defendant, who was a physician, and Browning v. Wabash Western R. Co. 124 Mo. 55, 24 S. W. 731, with respect to the subject-matter now under consideration, was followed with approval.

It is also insisted that this instruction is vicious in that it assumed the existence of facts disputed, in saying that, "together with the suffering caused by reason of said injury, together with such reasonable sum," etc.; but it will be observed that before the use of the words complained of, and in the same instruction, there was submitted to the jury the same question in these words, "and the bodily pain and mental anguish endured, if any, by the plaintiff by reason of such injury, if any;" and it was wholly unnecessary to again add the words "if any" after the words "together with the suffering caused by reason of said injury." It cannot in fairness, we think, be said that the instruction is erroneous upon the ground urged against it, or that it was misleading in its character.

A number of physicians were introduced as experts on behalf of plaintiff, and among them Dr. Halley, of Kansas City.

He testified as follows:

Q. Where did you meet her?

A. Nevada, Missouri.

Q. State to the jury whether or not you made an examination of that lady on the 14th of September, 1899, and, if so, what you found as a result of your examination.

A. I examined her in Nevada and found some bruises, some contusions on her back down near the hips, extending up from the hips over the small of the back, some marks, the effusion of blood underneath the skin and into the tissues, close down over the median line. There was a small black spot still, the result of blood effused under the skin and into the tissues underneath. I found that part of the back very painful to pressure; also that she manifested pain on bending the body,—bending the limbs forward or backward; that on making a pressure over the discolored parts I found her suffering with pains in the knees and ankles and wrists and shoulders. She had some uterine trouble as well, but these were the principal things she complained of when I examined her.

Q. Describe to the jury, if you will, what peculiar parts of the back were injured.

A. Well, it was the lower part of the small of the back and the upper part of the hips, extending from about the middle line of the hips up to the middle or small of the back; and spots were perhaps 5 inches in length, and 2, or 2½ inches in width.

Q. How are the hipbone and backbone or sacrum there joined together.

A. They are joined by a tough, dense, and tolerably hard substance called fibro-cartilage; it is the fibrous tissue with cartilage cells in it, which makes it very stiff and very strong.

Q. State to the jury if you know whether or not those ligaments or that cartilage were in any way affected by this injury.

A. On the left side the attachment of the sacrum to the hipbone was probably torn and the vertebræ or ligament of the vertebræ were also torn.

Q. The backbone?

A. That is, the lower spine between the first or second and third lumbar vertebra were evidently injured.

Q. State to the jury in what way the rupture or tearing of those ligaments would make itself manifest on the surface.

A. By black and blue places, and by the effusion of blood, the blood being extravasated.

Q. "Extravasated" means thrown out toward the surface.

A. Yes, sir; the blood vessels were torn, and the bleeding was into the tissues.

Q. State whether or not you have since that time examined this lady, and, if so, when and where.

A. I examined her this morning there at the hotel.

Q. Well, state to the jury what you found with reference to injuries now on her back or spine.

A. Well, I find that she is still suffering pain over the part where the black spot was when I examined her last September; that is, at the point where the hipbone joins the sacrum on the left side.

Q. That is, the backbone, the sacrum is—

A. A part of the backbone; yes, sir.

Q. Doctor, I will ask you this hypothetical question. Suppose that a lady twenty-five or twenty-six years of age has suffered a spell of malarial fever in Porto Rico, of about two months' duration, in which she was confined to her bed during that time, returned to this state in a weak, debilitated condition, incident to that fever, and is suffering from some derangement of the stomach in consequence of the fever, should be placed upon a padded table on her back, and a man should place his left hand over her stomach and his right hand or arms under her limbs or knees, and should bend her forward so that the knees should almost touch the breast, and should then turn the lady over on her face on this padded table, and place his left hand on the small of her back over her spine and his right hand under her knees, and violently bend the limbs and body upward, the lady never having suffered any injury to the back or spine or any complaints whatever with her back previous to the placing on the table as I have explained, and that afterwards there should be injuries to the spine and backbone, and to the ligaments and cartilage connecting the hipbone and backbone, what would you say had produced those injuries? (Defendants object to the question for the reason it is incompetent, and not a proper hypothetical question, and not founded on the testimony. Objection overruled, and an exception taken.)

A. I would say it was caused by the manipulations.

Q. I will ask you to state to the jury whether or not, assuming the facts as I have stated them in the hypothetical question which I have just asked you, a treatment of that character for the debilitated condition of the stomach and derangement of the stomach or any womb trouble would be the proper treatment.

A. Such manipulations could have no beneficial effect in a remedial way in treating any of the diseased conditions that have been enumerated.

Q. That could have no beneficial effect? What other sort of an effect would it have, if any? I am asking you whether or not that was proper treatment, in your opinion.

A. No, it was certainly not; for all medical treatment or manipulations are supposed at least to be for the benefit of the individual, and for the purpose of effecting a cure, and this could not benefit an individual suffering with the conditions that have been enumerated.

Q. Doctor, from the examination that you have made of this lady, state what, in your opinion, will be the effect of these injuries on her health.

A. I think it will give her a weak back, a painful back, for the rest of her life. It is a year since I examined her, or nearly so, and she is still suffering with pain in that part of the back, and the repair of it should have been effected within a year; should have been so complete that if she was going to be entirely cured it would have been effected already.

Q. Doctor, state, in your opinion, what will be the result of these injuries on this lady's life as to duration of life?

A. I do not think that it will materially affect her life.

The hypothetical questions submitted to the experts were practically the same, varying only in phraseology, but defendants insist that error was committed in allowing them to be answered over their objections, and many suggestions are presented by this 64 L. R. A.

appeal why the judgment should be reversed for those reasons, but most of them are too technical to merit consideration. The plaintiff had the right to predicate a hypothetical question upon her own testimony, and, in so far as Dr. Halley is concerned, the question propounded to him was in accordance therewith, in so far as the injury to the back was concerned. It is not so, however, with respect to hypothetical questions propounded to other experts, but it does not appear from the record that there was any objection to any of these questions, except the general one, to wit, "for the reason it is not a proper hypothetical question," but this was entirely too general, and amounted to no objection at all. It has always been held by this court that, when an objection is made at the trial to the admission of evidence, the reason for the objection must be stated. Rosenheim v. America Ins. Co. 33 Mo. 230; State v. Young, 153 Mo. 445, 55 S. W. 82; State v. Wright, 134 Mo. 417, 35 S. W. 1145; State v. Yandle, 166 Mo. 589, 66 S. W. 532. In the case of Houland v. Oakland Consol. Street R. Co. 110 Cal. 513, 42 Pac. 983, it was held that an objection to a hypothetical question asked of a physician in the general form that it is "irrelevant, immaterial, and incompetent, and not a proper hypothetical question," is insufficient to call the court's attention to any particular objection to it. As was said in that case, "appellant should have pointed out the particular defect which rendered the question either incompetent, irrelevant, or immaterial, or wherein it was not a proper hypothetical question, that the objection could have been intelligently ruled upon, and, if necessary or proper, obviated." See also Crocker v. Carpenter, 96 Cal. 421, 33 Pac. 271. If the objection to the question had been pointed out, it is probable that it could have been obviated, and in fairness to plaintiff she should have been afforded an opportunity of doing so, had she so desired, and if necessary.

It is also insisted that the hypothetical questions were all improper for the reason that the experts were permitted by them to tell the jury that in their opinions the particular treatment produced the injury, thus usurping the province of the jury, whose duty it was to pass upon that question. But this objection cannot be considered by this court, for the reason before indicated in regard to the generality of the objection to its admission.

Finding no reversible error in the record, we affirm the judgment.

All concur.

CROOKSTON WATERWORKS, POWER, & LIGHT COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

Daniel E. SPRAGUE, Respnt.

(.....Minn.....)

¶1. Section 2385, Gen. Stat. 1894, declares that all rivers within the state, of sufficient size for floating logs, timber, and lumber, are public highways, so far as to prevent obstructions to the same for such purposes. By § 2386 riparian owners are authorized to construct dams across such streams, provided they are equipped with locks, sluiceways, or booms sufficient and so arranged as to permit such materials to pass through without unreasonable delay. Held, the right of the public to the use of streams for driving logs is not paramount and unqualified, but subject to the incidental delays and hindrances occasioned by dams, if the means of passage through or around them is reasonably sufficient for the purpose.

I. General rights of navigator.

The right to use a navigable body of water for purposes of navigation is similar to the right to use the King's highway. It is one of the rights which citizens hold in common, and which cannot be taken from them except by authority of the government in the exercise of its sovereign power; and even then special injury must not be inflicted upon individuals. See note to Hutton v. Webb (N. C.) 59 L. R. A. 33. But, the right being a common one, each user must exercise it so as not to infringe upon the equal right of others; and he must remain within the right,—that is, he must not trespass upon private rights of riparian owners.

So far as is necessary, and so long as the interests of the general public are not impaired unreasonably, the owners of a tug may properly exercise their own judgment as to the size, arrangement, and management of the tow which they are attempting to take along a public navigable river. There is no law which limits the space a boat may occupy, or which prescribes how fast it may go, or how much swell it may cause, or how near it may pass to another boat. The rule of permission or restriction depends in each case upon the reasonableness of the thing done. A slow-sailing tow may not occupy unreasonably the entire channel of the river and thus impede its navigation by all other vessels. A leviathan may not rush through the water with a speed that will overwhelm in its surges all the craft ordinarily to be found on a river. The waters are open to all kinds of craft, large as well as small, and, while the rights of the smaller are to be carefully guarded, they are not to be made a pretense for excluding or preventing the practical use of larger or different vessels. The Daniel Drew, 13 Blatchf. 523, Fed. Cas. No. 3,565.

2. What constitutes a sufficient means of passage must depend upon the conditions of each particular case. A dam constructed with sufficient sluiceways to permit the free passage of logs, but which is not equipped with piling or piers to which sheer booms may be attached, or some other means provided by which the logs may be directed to the sluiceways, does not meet the requirements of the statute, and creates an unreasonable hindrance to the passage of logs at periods of high water, when it is difficult and impracticable to attach sheer booms, and guide the logs into the sluiceways, and keep them from running over the crest of the dam. Held, that, under the facts of this case, the owner of logs, who permitted the same to pass over the dam without guiding them through the sluiceways by means of sheer booms, and without taking out the sluice boards, was not responsible for damage to the dam occasioned thereby.

3. The facts found by the trial court are not inconsistent. They justify the judgment as ordered, and appellant is not entitled to judgment upon the facts found.

The navigator of a public river must conduct his craft with ordinary care and caution, and with the same circumspection, and in that careful, prudent manner, which would seem to be dictated by common sense, and with due regard to the rights, property, and lives of others. Com. v. Bilderback, 2 Pars. Sel. Eq. Cas. 447.

During the navigation of a public stream in a reasonable manner, no liability will be incurred when, notwithstanding the exercise of ordinary care, the navigation of the stream is necessarily and unavoidably impeded or obstructed temporarily. Davis v. Winslow, 51 Me. 264, 81 Am. Dec. 573.

One who unlawfully obstructs a stream by his boats is liable if he endangers another boat waiting to pass, and meanwhile endangered from a rising stream. Scott v. Hunter, 46 Pa. 192, 84 Am. Dec. 542; also cases collected in note to Hutton v. Webb (N. C.) 59 L. R. A. 33, II. b, 1.

The right of navigation, while paramount, is not exclusive, and cannot be exercised to the unnecessary or wanton destruction of ice fields, or so as to deprive riparian proprietors or the public of the use of the stream for legitimate purposes which will not unreasonably interfere with the right of navigation. People's Ice Co. v. The Excelsior, 44 Mich. 229, 38 Am. Rep. 246, 6 N. W. 636.

The launch of a newly built ship into the water of a crowded harbor is an event of such danger that the builder must be cautious to give ample warning to passing vessels. Malster v. Humphreys, 5 Hughes, 180, 2 Fed. 535.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Polk County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for injuries inflicted on plaintiff's dam by defendant's attempt to use a stream for running logs. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Messrs. Rome G. Brown and Charles S. Albert, for appellant:

It was not plaintiff's duty to provide sheer booms, and its failure to provide them was not negligence.

Even independent of the statute, the right of the riparian owner to construct, maintain, and operate dams upon the rivers of this state, both those that are technically navigable and those that are not, is firmly established.

No recovery can be had for injury to gas pipes laid in the bed of a navigable river by an anchor dragging thereon, which is prohibited by ordinance, as, if it be a proper act of navigation for vessels passing up and down a navigable river to drag their anchors on the bottom as incident to their sailing and towing them out of harbors or narrow streams, an ordinance of the city cannot prohibit it. Milwaukee Gaslight Co. v. The Gamecock, 23 Wis. 144, 99 Am. Dec. 138.

But if, with proper care and diligence, injury to a gas pipe laid in the bed of navigable waters could have been prevented after the dragging anchor of a passing vessel came in contact therewith, recovery may be had for damages occasioned thereby. Ibid.

II. Must not exceed capacity of stream.

The right to use a body of water for purposes of navigation is limited to its natural capacity or, in case it has been improved, to that imparted to it by the improvement.

But in an action against a person navigating a river for injury to oysters lying upon the bed of the river which were injured by the vessel grounding during low tide, it was held that one navigating a tidal river which is so shallow at certain states of the tide that vessels cannot float there is not required to reach his destination in a single tide; and a vessel which cannot so reach its destination may remain aground upon the bed of the stream until the tide again removes it. In determining this, the court says no authority directly in point was cited at the bar, nor have we been able to find any after considerable search; but, upon principle, the matter seems clear. It cannot be disputed that the channel of a public and navigable river is properly described as a common highway, although the analogy between it and a highway on land is not complete in all particulars; and there is no one circumstance which more decisively affixes upon the river the character of being public and navigable in this sense of a highway than the flow and reflow of the tide in it. Now, if, in such rivers, it was to be held that the character did not extend higher up than the water sufficed to float vessels at all times, or was suspended during such periods of the tides as left the channel too shallow for that purpose, rights of the public, invaluable and immemorial in numerous rivers, would be abridged or rendered in many particu-

After the dam owner has provided sluiceways required by statute for the use of the log driver, then the right of neither the log driver nor the dam owner is paramount to the right of the other. Each is bound to the other simply by the rule of reasonable use.

lars vexatiously uncertain, and in many cases be rendered nearly, if not entirely, useless. To say that the river ceased to be navigable, ceased to be a highway, at the ebb or other states of the tide when such vessels could not float, is in effect to say that, except for a short portion of every month, they should not use the river at all for the purpose of trading with places. It is more reasonable to hold that the term "navigable" is a relative and comprehensive term, containing within itself such rights upon the waterway as, used with relation to the circumstances of each river, are necessary for the full and convenient passage of vessels and boats along the channel. When will this be repugnant to any legal principle applicable to the case? It does not interfere with the rights of individuals on the banks, but stands on this broad ground. The right of soil in arms of the sea and public navigable rivers, which the Crown prima facie has independent of any ownership in the adjoining land, must in all cases be considered as subject to the public right of passage, however acquired; and any grantee of the Crown must take subject to such right. In this large sense, the river is navigable, and is a highway at all times, and at all states of the tide. Colchester v. Brooke, 7 Q. B. 339, 15 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 59, 9 Jur. 1090.

The mere fact that a vessel is grounded in a stream at low tide does not prove that such vessel is unfit, by reason of her draught of water, to navigate such stream, so as to render such grounding a public nuisance. Cummins v. Spruance, 4 Harr. (Del.) 315.

If a steamship, although touching bottom, is actually progressing through the soft mud by the force of its screw, it is not liable for breaking a telegraph cable unless the cable is shown to have been laid so as not to obstruct navigation. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Inman & I S. S. Co. 8 C. C. A. 152, 20 U. S. App. 247, 59 Fed. 365, Affirming 43 Fed. 85.

If the stream is not navigable, a person who injures the dam of one owning the land on both sides of the stream by attempting to float logs in the stream will be liable for the injury. Hoskins v. Archer, 6 Ky. L. Rep. 671.

So, one seeking to justify the running of logs down a stream, which resulted in the breaking down of the dam of a riparian owner, must show that the stream was navigable, the declaration having alleged, in effect, that the stream would not have been navigable but for the said dam. McLaren v. Buck, 26 U. C. C. P. 539.

Brisbine v. St. Paul & S. C. R. Co. 23 Minn. 114; Morrill v. St. Anthony Falls Water Power Co. 26 Minn. 222, 37 Am. Rep. 399, 2 N. W. 842; Kretschmar v. Meekhan, 74 Minn. 211, 77 N. W. 41.

The right of floatage in such cases is not paramount to the use of the stream and the water therein for machinery.

Middleton v. Flat River Boom Co. 27 Mich. 533.

The rights and duties of the dam owner and the log driver, the one to the other, are such that the dam owner is not bound to furnish sheer booms for the use of the log driver, to guide the logs to the sluices.

In this case the dam owner is hindered by the necessity of building a sluiceway in his dam for logs, and of allowing, when necessary, sufficient water for the sluiceway to carry the logs through. The log driver, on the other hand, may be hindered by being compelled to guide his logs through the sluice, instead of letting them come free down the river as they would without the existence of the dam. It is the same principle as the common use of a street or highway, where each user gives way to the other to a certain degree, and no one has a paramount right against the other.

While in a sense a man has a right to float logs when he chooses, he cannot make others suffer because of his unreasonable attempt to float logs which he ought to know will not float. Bellows v. Crane Lumber Co. 126 Mich. 476, 85 N. W. 1103.

The owner of a dam on a stream not navigable for boats, vessels, or rafts is entitled to damages for injuries to the dam by logs thrown into the stream and floated down over the dam. Munson v. Hungerford, 6 Barb. 265.

III. Excessive speed.

A steamer navigating a narrow channel must regulate its speed so as not to injure by its swell craft proceeding at slower speed through the same channel. The C. H. Northam, 13 Blatchf. 81, Fed. Cas. No. 2,690, Affirming 7 Ben. 249, Fed. Cas. No. 2,689.

In plying about rivers and harbors where their swell and suction are likely to produce injury to other craft following their legitimate business, steamers must give heed to their presence, and by slowing or stopping the engine temporarily, as the case may be, avoid doing them unnecessary damage. The New York, 34 Fed. 757; De Lelle v. The Atalanta, 34 Fed. 918.

A steamer will be liable for maintaining so great a speed that, by reason of the shallowness of the water, injury is caused to boats moored in her path. The Drew, 22 Fed. 852; The Morrisania, 13 Blatchf. 512, Fed. Cas. No. 9,838; The Massachusetts, 10 Ben. 177, Fed. Cas. No. 9,258.

A steamer running at such speed in a river as to cause a boat loading at a wharf to thump on the bottom because of her suction is liable for the injuries thereby caused. Cornwall v. New York, 38 Fed. 710.

But a charge that, in navigating rivers where small boats are accustomed to ply and may be reasonably expected, steamboats are bound to navigate with caution and at a rate of speed sufficiently slow to avoid danger from their attendant swells, is erroneous, since a steamboat is not bound, as matter of law, under all circumstances to proceed at such a rate of speed as to avoid the danger to other vessels from her swells. Bell v. New Jersey S. B. Co. 54 App. Div. 526, 86 N. Y. Supp. 1031.

A boat owner may recover for the destruction of his vessel while moored at a wharf, due to the negligence of a steamer which ran rapidly through a river filled with ice, causing large pieces thereof to strike the boat so that it sank. O'Reilly v. New Brunswick, A. & N. Y. S. B. Co. 26 Misc. 195, 55 N. Y. Supp. 1133.

It is the duty of a steam vessel passing near docks or other mooring places to pass at such a rate of speed that no danger will be likely to result from her swells, provided she has timely notice of the presence of other vessels at such docks as are likely to be damaged from the suction or swells of the steamer. Bell v. New Jersey, S. B. Co. 54 App. Div. 526, 86 N. Y. Supp. 1031.

The destruction of an ice field formed within a boom by running a vessel rapidly up and down the river close to the boom, so that the swell thereby created broke up the ice field, gives a cause of action for damages within the boat and vessel law. People's Ice Co. v. The Excelsior, 43 Mich. 336, 5 N. W. 398.

A steamer in a navigable river, which has abundant room to proceed on her course without deviation or delay, and at such a distance from a boom maintained for the protection of an ice field that no injury will be done, is liable for passing and repassing so close to it that the resulting swell breaks up the field. Id. 44 Mich. 229, 38 Am. Rep. 246, 6 N. W. 636.

IV. Collision.

The general subject of collision between vessels for violation of the sailing rules or otherwise is not within the scope of this note, which deals only with the general duty of the navigator to avoid the infliction of injury by propelling his vessel against the property of others to its injury.

One navigating a stream is liable for running into a wharf and injuring it, although it constitutes a public nuisance, where he might have avoided it with reasonable convenience, as one cannot abate a public nuisance in a highway or navigable stream if he can avoid it with reasonable convenience by passing around it. Dimes v. Petley, 15 Q. B. 276, 19 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 449, 14 Jur. 1132.

A steamer is not liable for injury to a bridge, which is the result of mere accident and without fault on the part of the steamer. St. Louis & St. P. Packet Co. v. Keokuk & H. Bridge Co. 81 Fed. 761.

The fact that a boat has been driven against a bridge, and is pounding against it to its damage, is prima facie evidence of negligence on the part of its owner, and the onus is upon him to

The dam owner does not have to conduct the logs through the sluice any more than a bridge owner who has constructed a bridge across a navigable river has to take the boats from above or below and conduct them through and past the draws of the bridge.

Texas & P. R. Co. v. Interstate Transp. Co. 155 U. S. 585, 589, 39 L. ed. 271, 272, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 228; Angell, Watercourses, 7th ed. § 556; Brown v. Chadbourne, 31 Me. 9, 50 Am. Dec. 641; Parks v. Morse, 52 Me. 260.

in this case, because it is the law of reasonable use which was established to govern the relations as to the use by two different persons who had a right to use the same thing.

Where a pile had been placed in the soil of the bed of a stream more than twenty years since, in front of a wharf, by the owner of the wharf, and is essential to the enjoyment of the wharf, it will be presumed that it has not become a part of the soil, but that it was placed there by virtue of an easement granted by the Crown, or whoever had a right to grant it, to the occupiers of the adjoining wharf; and they have such possession of it as will entitle them to maintain an action against one negligently running into and injuring it. Lancaster v. Eve, 5 C. B. N. S. 717, 28 L. J. C. P. N. S. 255, 5 Jur. N. S. 683.

In Submarine Teleg. Co. v. Dickson, 15 C. B. N. S. 758, 33 L. J. C. P. N. S. 139, 10 Jur. N. S. 211, 10 L. T. N. S. 32, 12 Week. Rep. 384, an action against the owner of a vessel for negligently dragging its anchor so as to injure a telegraph cable, the court said: It would assume, for the purpose of the case, that the bottom of the sea may be used for lawful purposes, and we take it, inasmuch as there are acts of Parliament on the subject, that the placing of telegraph cables at the bottom of the sea is a known mode of using that part of the earth's surface. The plaintiff's property was therefore lawfully placed where it was.

A statute making the owner of vessels liable for injuries done by the vessels to a pier or dock was held in the River Wear Comrs. v. Adamson, L. R. 1 Q. B. Div. 546, 46 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 83, 24 Week. Rep. 872, 35 L. T. N. S. 118, as not applying to a case where the damage to a pier was occasioned by a vessel driven against it by the wind and waves at a time when the master and crew were compelled to escape from it. This was upon the ground that a statutory liability did not extend to and include injuries resulting from an act of God in the absence of express provision to that effect. The decision was affirmed in L. R. 2 App. Cas. 743, 37 L. T. N. S. 543, 47 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 193, 26 Week. Rep. 217, but upon different grounds. The lord chancellor based his decision upon the ground that the statute was one regulating the procedure and mode in which the right of action for damages already existing was to be asserted, and that it did not create any liability in addition to the common-law liability. Lord O'Hagan placed his decision upon the ground that the statute, as construed by him, only applied to cases in which someone was in charge of the ship, and that in this case, the ship having been abandoned, the statute did not apply.

But later it was held that under the harbors, docks, and piers clauses act of 1847, the owner of a vessel doing damage to the piers or works of a harbor must in all cases make good the damage, and is not relieved by the fact that the injury was the result of an inevitable accident caused by stress of weather. Dennis v. Tovell, L. R. 8 Q. B. 10, 42 L. J. M. C. N. S. 33, 27 L. T. N. S. 482, 21 Week. Rep. 170.

The owners of a vessel are liable for injuries to a sea wall caused by their vessel being driven by wind and tide against the wall after it had struck on a sand bank as the result of the negligence of the crew. *Romney Marsh v. One who uses ordinary prudence, skill, and diligence to preserve his fleet by the use of lines during a sudden, extraordinary, and unexpected rise of the river is not liable for damages inflicted by a boat, which was carried away at night and collided with the boats of the libellant. Neel v. Blythe, 42 Fed. 457.

No liability attaches for damage to a bridge injured by a boat released from its moorings without the owner's negligence during an extraordinary condition of the water. McCauley v. Logan, 152 Pa. 202, 25 Atl. 499.

A boat fast in the ice, which floats against a bridge, may constitute a nuisance to the latter which the owner of the bridge is authorized to remove, using ordinary care to do no unnecessary injury, without liability for injury thereby done to the boat. *Mark v. Where a sand-boat company entered into an agreement with a bridge company constructing a bridge across a river that, if a space were left in the navigable portion, it would navigate its boats through that space, and did so for some weeks, but, subsequently, contrary to such agreement, ran a boat close to shore, thereby breaking guy ropes, which resulted in the fall of a derrick upon an employee of the bridge company, the sand-boat company may not, in an action by the employee to recover for his injuries, defend on the ground that the bridge company had not obtained permission from the

The master of a vessel is not guilty of negligence in mooring the vessel at a buoy in a port without examining it for latent defects, where the mooring of ships to the buoy was sanctioned by the authorities of the port, who treated it as a proper and sufficient mooring place. *Doward v. A telegraph company acting under a null and void charter cannot recover damages from the owner of a vessel, the anchor of which fouled and brought up such company's cable, which one of the crew severed. Doboy & U. I. Teleg. Co. v. De Magathias, 25 Fed. 697.

If the injury to the cable is caused by a peril of the sea, the vessel is not liable. The Carl Frederick, 33 Fed. 589.

Navigators of a river have the right to land at such wharves as suit their convenience; and if, in so doing, their boat overlaps an adjoining wharf for a portion of its length, they are but in the exercise of a legal right, and are not responsible for any consequential damages which such adjoining wharf owner may sustain by other boats being thereby prevented from landing at his wharf; provided that, in thus exercising their right, they use due care, skill, and despatch, and subject such wharf owner to as little inconvenience as possible, consistently with the exercise of their own rights. Sherlock v. Bainbridge, 41 Ind. 35, 13 Am. Rep. 302.

One navigating a river and landing at a public wharf with his vessel in the regular course of his business is not guilty of a trespass if his boat overlaps an adjoining wharf without touching it, and will not be liable for damages occasioned by his boat preventing other boats from landing at such wharf, or for injury to the wharf, if there is no want of skill and care on the part of the navigator. Ibid.

Appellant, being the owner of the soil over which said non-navigable stream flowed, had the right, at common law, to build a dam across it, provided it did not interfere with the use of the stream for floating the logs of respondent.

VI. Injury to fishing rights.

Since the manner of exercising the right to fish in navigable waters is such that a temporary suspension of it will not ordinarily cause preceptible loss, it is required to give way before the right of navigation, especially in view of the fact that, if it were regarded as a permanent paramount right, it would amount to an obstruction of the right of navigation, and would, therefore, be unlawful. But the navigation right must not be exercised arbitrarily so as to cause unnecessary injury to the fishing rights.

A boat on a navigable stream has a right to "take her course" and to go to the bank, when and where it is necessary to do so, doing no unnecessary damage, and acting without wantonness or malice, and is not obliged to stop or go out of her way or wait upon the movements of those who are managing a fishing seine or net, as the right of fishery is subordinate to that of navigation, and enjoyed by the suzerainty of the sovereign, and not as of right conferred by grant. Lewis v. Keeling, 46 N. C. (1 Jones L.) 299.

A seine placed in the regular course of navigation and in such part of a channel that, if a steamship had attempted to avoid it she would have been in danger of grounding, is an obstruction to navigation, and the owners of the seine cannot recover damages for injury to it by a passing vessel, or for loss of the fish secured in it at the time. The City of Baltimore, 5 Ben. 474, Fed. Cas. No. 2,744.

The right of fishery on a navigable river is subject to the right of the public to use the river for all purposes of navigation, and a ship interfering with the right of fishery in mooring or unloading its cargo is not liable to the owner 64 L. R. A.

of the fishery right unless he abuses his right. Anonymous, 1 Campb. 517, note. Wood, B., stated that the only case he could remember of the kind was where a man obstinately refused to move his ship from opposite a wharf, although it would have been just the same if he had moved a little one way or the other; and therefore he abused his right, and the plaintiff recovered.

But, while the right of navigation is paramount, it is not exclusive, so as to excuse from liability the owner of a steam tug and barge which damaged fishing nets placed outside the regular channel of navigation, and visible at a considerable distance before reaching them. Hopkins v. Norfolk & S. R. Co. 131 N. C. 463, 42 S. E. 902.

When a vessel owner on a public river is warned of his approach toward the net of a fisherman, he is liable for damage resulting from failure to change his course only if he can do so without prejudice to the reasonable prosecution of his voyage. Cobb v. Bennett, 75 Pa. 326, 15 Am. Rep. 732.

The owner of a tug is liable for damages to a fish net, caused by running through it, where he negligently failed to see and avoid such net when it could have been avoided without detriment to the prosecution of the voyage, although the right of navigation is paramount to that of fishing, and such act was not maliciously or wantonly done. Wright v. Mulvaney, 78 Wis. 89, 9 L. R. A. 807, 46 N. W. 1045.

While the right of navigation is paramount to the right of fishing on a river where the tide ebbs and flows, it is to be exercised fairly and with due regard to the subordinate right; and the master of a vessel who designedly and wantonly injures the property of, and interferes with, a fisherman, is liable in damages. Post v. Munn, 4 N. J. L. 61, 7 Am. Dec. 570.

One who knowingly and without necessity or any reasonable commercial purpose anchors his vessel within the limits of a fishery so as to interrupt the same, or remains therein under such conditions, is liable to the owner of the fishery for damages. Mason v. Mansfield, 4 Cranch C. C. 580, Fed. Cas. No. 9,243.

The master of a vessel is not liable for obstructing a fishery, where he anchored his vessel in the channel for the purpose of taking in the residue of his cargo, and although he did not immediately depart when required to do so, when his conduct is not attributable to malice,

One who anchors his boat to the nuisance of those engaged in a fishery in public waters cannot be forced to desist by one who desires to exercise the public right of fishery, although such nuisance is wilfully created for the hindrance of the particular person seeking its abatement. Day v. Day, 4 Md. 262.

The measure of damages for negligent injury to a fishing net by a tug is the value of the use of the net during the time the owners were necessarily deprived of its use. Wright v. Mulvaney, 78 Wis. 89, 9 L. R. A. 807, 46 N. W. 1045.

A vessel injuring oysters placed upon the bed of a navigable stream is not justified upon the ground that they constituted an obstruction to navigation, unless it appears that the vessel could not with due care and skill have prevented the injury, as one cannot abate a public nuisance who suffers no special inconvenience therefrom. Colchester v. Brooke, 7 Q. B. 339, 15 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 59, 9 Jur. 1090.

Fishermen employed by the owner of a fishery, and compensated by a share of the spoil, are not proper parties to such owner's action against the master of a vessel for destroying the nets and interfering with the fishing rights, and have no interest in the damages recovered. Post v. Munn, 4 N. J. L. 61, 7 Am. Dec. 570.

VII. Floating logs.

Many of the injuries which have been caused by attempted navigation have occurred through the floating of logs in the stream. On the general question of the right to use the stream for that purpose, and of the liability for injuries caused by the exercise of that right, attention is directed to the note to Coyne v. Mississippi & R. River Boom Co. (Minn.) 41 L. R. A. 494.

In addition to the cases there cited, it may be stated that, in the presence of concurrent rights, the one to float timber and the other, as a mill and landowner, to have his property protected from unnecessary and damaging displacement of water and obstructions of floating timber, the former is bound to use ordinary care in conducting his business that damage by him be averted from the latter's property. Gulf Red Cedar Co. v. Walker, 132 Ala. 553, 31 So. 374.

The same degree of care not to affect the rights of others will be required from one exercising the public right of navigation in a river capable of such use, to float logs on a large scale, as from an individual floating only a small number of logs. Sewall's Falls Bridge v. Fisk, 23 N. H. 171.

The right to run rafts in navigable waters must be exercised with due regard to the rights of others and to the general usages and customs of navigation and commerce. The proprietor of a raft while so exercising his rights is entitled to claim from others due observance of the fundamental principle of navigation that the craft having the best facilities for its own management is charged with the corresponding duty to employ those facilities so as to avoid collision and injury. The Athabasca, 45 Fed. 651.

The right of passage on a navigable stream is a common and paramount one, but must be exercised with due regard for the rights of riparian owners and with ordinary care and skill. Floating logs may cause damage to the riparian owner, but against this the navigator does not insure; he is only obliged to drive the logs in an ordinarily careful and prudent manner. Coyne v. Mississippi & R. River Boom Co. 72 Minn. 533, 41 L. R. A. 494, 75 N. W. 748.

The gist of an action for injury from the alleged improper use of a floatable stream is negligence. Hunter v. Grande Ronde Lumber Co. 39 Or. 448, 65 Pac. 598.

Though a stream is a highway for the purpose of floating logs, persons so using it have no right to store water and then suddenly discharge the accumulation so as to increase the natural volume of the stream and overflow or wash away the adjacent banks; such erosion is in the nature of a trespass for which the property owner is entitled to recover damages. Brewster v. J. & J. Rogers Co. 169 N. Y. 73, 58 L. R. A. 495, 62 N. E. 164.

An accumulation of the waters of a navigable stream in a splash dam, constructed by a lumber company for the purpose of floating its logs down such stream, and the sudden tearing away of the dam, thereby releasing the accumulated water and causing it to rush down the stream carrying the logs with it, are not a lawful use of such stream for the purposes of navigation; and the riparian owners below, whose lands are damaged by the overflow caused by such floods and by the depositing of logs thereon, may recover the damages sustained thereby. Kentucky Lumber Co. v. Miracle, 101 Ky. 364, 41 S. W. 25.

A person owning a mill site cannot be deprived of its use by the wrongful acts of mill owners; nor does the fact that he straightened the channel above his mill at their expense authorize them to fill the stream with logs beyond its fair capacity, and to such an extent as to endanger the mill. Koopman v. Blodgett, 70 Mich. 610, 38 N. W. 649.

Where the construction and operation of a splash dam have injured the property of persons situated on the stream below, a cause of action exists therefor. Ford Lumber & Mfg. Co. v. Clark, 24 Ky. L. Rep. 318, 68 S. W. 443.

But a company engaged in running logs, and which maintains a dam for flooding, is not liable for damages caused by the floods of other persons who maintain dams on the stream or its tributaries above the property flooded. Bauman v. Pere Marquette Boom Co. 66 Mich. 544, 33 N. W. 538.

One who wilfully lets loose logs in a navigable stream, whereby a bridge is injured, is liable for the damage done. Cue v. Breeland, 78 Miss. 864, 29 So. 850.

Persons attempting to use a stream for floating logs are liable for injuries to a milldam the right to maintain which has been acquired by use for more than fifty years and originally by condemnation proceedings under the county court, if caused by their negligence, either in not securing their logs until a time when they can be safely turned adrift, or in the manner in which they are sent over the dam; and in such case they are not relieved from responsibility because such stream is a navigable one. James v. Carter, 96 Ky. 378, 29 S. W. 19.

That a log owner employs sufficient men, and uses due diligence, to keep the river clear, does not absolve him from the statutory liability to other log owners for an obstruction of the stream, where he improperly attempts to flow logs that should be expected to sink, and which make it impossible for anyone to keep the river clear. Bellows v. Crane Lumber Co. 126 Mich. 476, 85 N. W. 1108.

It seems that, where a dam is constructed in a floatable stream without authority of the county court, one exercising the right of floatage cannot wilfully or negligently injure the dam without being liable to the dam owner. Watts v. Norfolk & W. R. Co. 39 W. Va. 196, 28 L. R. A. 674, 19 S. E. 521.

A log owner cannot be excused for destroying a bridge over the stream, unless that act results while in the use of due and reasonable care and diligence in the course of navigation, as a bridge is not necessarily a nuisance. Thurlow Twp. v. Bogart, 15 U. C. C. P. 9.

A log owner may adopt reasonable means for getting his logs past a dam erected on a floatable stream by a person denying the public's easement, without being liable for the damages caused thereby. In this case the removal of a portion of the dam was held reasonable. Brown v. Chadbourne, 31 Me. 9, 50 Am. Dec. 641.

The use of a river as a highway for the purpose of conveying logs and lumber to market is a right common to all subject to Federal control, or, in the absence of such legislation, to state regulation; but this common right gives no immunity to individuals for injuries committed while using it. United States v. Mississippi & R. River Boom Co. 1 McCrary, 601, 3 Fed. 548.

A boom company accustomed to run its logs over a falls will be enjoined from doing so at the suit of the government, where the exercise of such right injures improvements made under the authority of Congress in the interests of commerce; and the company will be required to guide them into a sluiceway provided for their passage. Ibid.

While the fact that a mill has long stood idle is not a sufficient ground for denying an injunction to restrain a boom company from so using the stream as to endanger the property and prevent its use, it affords a reason why the court should be cautious in awarding an injunction, since it increases the difficulty in laying down rules to govern the conduct of the parties when the mill shall be put in operation. Buchanan v. Grand River & G. Log Running Co. 48 Mich. 364, 12 N. W. 490.

One using a public stream for floating his rafts has a right, in the use of reasonable care and with no unnecessary damage, to effect a passage therefor through the dam and obstructions placed in the river by a mill owner who has not provided and maintained a suitable way. Dwinnel v. Veazie, 44 Me. 167, 69 Am. Dec. 94.

One engaged in floating logs is liable for withholding, of its own volition, from another log owner below, the natural flow of the stream by the use of his dam. O'Brien v. Northwestern Improv. & Boom Co. 82 Minn. 136, 84 N. W. 735.

Log drivers are not liable to the owners of a tug for the obstruction of a navigable stream, where their logs are detained by the logs of others in the river below them, and they remove them as soon as they reasonably can. Gifford v. McArthur, 55 Mich. 535, 22 N. W. 28.

The use of storage dams by a log owner for his private use in the floating of logs cannot be justified under the doctrine of eminent domain. Brewster v. J. & J. Rogers Co. 42 App. Div. 343, 59 N. Y. Supp. 32.

One floating logs down a stream, who negligently allows a log jam to form, is liable for injury to land caused thereby. Hopkins v. Butte & M. Commercial Co. 16 Mont. 356, 40 Pac. 865.

A boom company engaged in running logs, which knows of the existence of a jam which it is unable to remove, is liable in damages where it assists in bringing down more logs and adding to the jam, whereby the water is so raised as to set back on the plaintiff's land. Bauman v. Pere Marquette Boom Co. 66 Mich. 544, 33 N. W. 538.

A log owner has no right, by the formation of jams or otherwise, to flood riparian land to the full extent of the most extraordinary freshet of the year. He is not entitled to flow adjoining lands to a greater extent than would happen if the logs were left to themselves and allowed to float down stream naturally and without artificial interference. Witheral v. Muskegon Booming Co. 68 Mich. 48, 35 N. W. 758.

One having a right to maintain a log boom on a river, which he constructs and operates with due care, will be liable to riparian owners if he attempts to float in the stream an amount of timber which far exceeds its capacity so that it forms jams and casts the water from the stream onto abutting property to its injury. 64 L. R. A.

Alabama Lumber Co. v. Keel, 125 Ala. 603, 28 So. 204.

And it has been held that if, to catch logs coming down a river, the owner throws a boom across the stream, he will be liable for the injury thereby caused to the owner of a steamboat which is prevented by the boom from reaching its destination. Crandell v. Mooney, 23 U. C. C. P. 212. In this case the relative or respective rights of logs and vessel owners were not involved as the boom was stretched in mere anticipation, no logs having reached it at the time of injury.

In an action for injury to land from overflow caused by the formation of a log jam in a stream, evidence showing the method of operation adopted by the owner of the logs in floating them, by allowing jams to form and then breaking them by precipitating other jams upon them from above, instead of releasing them as they formed, is competent and admissible in establishing negligence. Hopkins v. Butte & M. Commercial Co. 16 Mont. 356, 40 Pac. 865.

The owner of logs who places the drive in the hands of an independent contractor is not thereby relieved from liability for damages from the flooding of lands by the opening of a dam to pass such logs, if such act would naturally or necessarily result in the injury complained of without negligence on the part of such contractor. Carlson v. Stocking, 91 Wis. 432, 65 N. W. 58.

But one who owns timber lands and maintains dams for flooding purposes is not liable for injuries sustained by a landowner due to an unreasonable use of the stream through the operation of the dams by an independent contractor employed by the owner of the timber land to cut and draw logs, and authorized to use the dams for that purpose. Carter v. Berlin Mills Co. 58 N. H. 52, 42 Am. Rep. 572.

The owner of a toll bridge carried away by the negligent floating of logs by another is entitled to recover from him the actual damages the latter caused him to suffer, which would be the loss of tolls during the time reasonably necessary to repair or rebuild it, added to the value of the superstructure carried away and lost, and not added to the value of the franchise of taking tolls. Sewall's Falls Bridge v. Flisk, 23 N. H. 171.

Scottish Carolina Timber Co.* 115 N. C. 579, 20 S. E. 465.

Lumbermen, jointly engaged in driving logs down a floatable, but not navigable, river, who did not place men at a municipal bridge to protect it during the drive, and took no precaution to prevent the formation of jams of logs at the piers of a railway bridge which crossed the river a short distance below the municipal bridge, but abandoned the drive before the logs had been safely boomed at the river mouth,—are jointly and severally liable for the carrying away of the municipality bridge, caused by the penning back of the water and sweeping back of a quantity of logs up the stream upon the occurrence of a sudden freshet. *Ward v. A log-driving company is not bound to erect dams or other structures to protect the land of riparian proprietors, nor liable for damages resulting thereto from wing dams, if such dams are reasonably necessary or proper to facilitate the driving of logs at the point in question. Ibid.

Maintaining piling in a river adjoining property of a third person to facilitate the floating of logs, and maintaining it in such a way as to turn the water, logs, and ice upon such person's property, whereby its shores are washed away, is a continuing nuisance for which successive suits for damages may be brought. Bowers v. Mississippi & R. River Boom Co. 78 Minn. 398, 81 N. W. 203.

Vessels have no right, in navigating a river, to move so closely to docks as to interfere with property upon the same by the extension of any part of the vessel, as bows, masts, spars, or booms, along and above the line of the dock. both sides of the Red Lake river, in Crookston, and the dam constructed at that point. Respondent, a citizen of Winnipeg, on June 6, 1899, owned a large quantity of logs that were collected in the river at a point about 500 feet above the dam. Respondent opened the boom, and allowed the logs to float down the stream over the dam, without any attempt on his part, and without any effort on the part of appellant, to direct or confine them to the sluiceways. The dam was considerably injured at different places, and this action was brought to recover damages arising therefrom. The court found the damages to be $3,450, but ordered judgment for respondent.

The assignments of error present only one question, viz.: Do the findings of fact justify the conclusion of law and judgment for respondent? If not, do the findings of fact entitle appellant to judgment for the amount of damages found? Appellant submits the case to this court wholly upon these questions of law. The findings are apparently somewhat conflicting, and, in order to properly understand their bearing and relation to the issues in the case, it will be necessary to examine them in some detail:

The court finds: (2, 3) That appellant was the owner of the riparian lands and dam, and of the flowage rights in the stream, and, in connection with its predecessor, had been in exclusive possession thereof for more than fifteen years prior to this action, and (10) in connection therewith maintained an electric and power plant. (5, 6, 7) That from 1872 to 1875, Red Lake river, in its natural condition, was

N. Y. 484, 1 Am. Rep. 569, Affirming 42 Barb. 368, where the recovery was limited to the damages occasioned by permitting the logs to remain where they lodged for an unreasonable time, which seems to have been all that was claimed in the action, there being nothing to show that any injury was caused by the mere judgment of the logs.

A license of the privilege of banking and putting logs into a floatable stream upon the lands of a riparian proprietor, without intendment of regulating the manner of doing the work, will not estop the licensor from recovery if the logs are so negligently banked and piled in the stream as unnecessarily to do him damage. Hunter v. Grande Ronde Lumber Co. 39 Or. 448, 63 Pac. 598.

For the destruction of a freehold by the washing away of land only the owner of the inheritance can recover. Anderson v. Thunder Bay River Boom Co. 57 Mich. 216, 23 N. W. 776.

The purchaser of land under a contract which does not give him possessory rights until he has fulfilled the conditions of the contract and become entitled to a conveyance cannot maintain an action for injury to the freehold due to the washing away of land. Des Jardins v. Thunder Bay River Boom Co. 95 Mich. 140, 54 N. W. 718.

The effect of the dock act of 1847 is to make the owners of vessels liable for all injuries inflicted by the vessels on a dock or pier, though they arise from inevitable accident. The Merle, 31 L. T. N. S. 447.

IX. Contributory negligence.

One who places piles in the water, and allows them to remain floating, and without a light, alongside his derrick, fastened to the shore, cannot recover for their injury by a tug, whose propeller was caught and stopped by them. The Wm. N. Beach, 29 Fed. 303.

The owner of a wharf, who projects a mast therefrom, extending over the river, has no right of action if the same is injured by the bowsprit of the vessel coming in contact with it on the falling of the tide, although the bowsprit overhangs the wharf. Dalton v. Denton, 1 C. B. N. S. 672.

One who, in a season of high water, moors a flat boat in a swift current near his storehouse for use as a landing place, is chargeable with such negligence as will preclude a recovery, where a steamboat which had made fast to the flat boat swung against the storehouse and ruined it when the line to which the steamboat was fastened to the flat boat was thrown off to prevent it from breaking the flat boat from its moorings. Love v. The Montgomery, 10 La. Ann. 113.

The owner of a milldam on a stream capable of and used for floating logs must use due diligence in the protection of his property from injury from such logs; and neglect on his part to build an apron on the dam, the building of which would have avoided injuries from the logs, will prevent his recovery for such injuries, where the owner of the logs was guilty of no negligence in putting them in the stream and floating them over the dam. Huff v. Kentucky Lumber Co. 20 Ky. L. Rep. 39, 45 S. W. 84.

Where a corner of one of the piers to a toll bridge is knocked off by a vessel carelessly running into it in passing through the draw, the toll bridge company is not guilty of contributory negligence in failing to protect the bridge by piles, although its charter required it to maintain in good repair a suitable draw. Toll Bridge Co. v. Langrell, 47 Conn. 228.

But Crookston Waterworks P. & L. Co. v. Sprague indicates that the duty is not all upon the owner of the dam. The rights of the dam owner and of the log owner being equal the former is bound to furnish facilities for the protection of his dam but the latter is bound to make use of them. The right to construct a dam across a navigable stream being, however, not absolute but by sufferance, the legislature may impose such conditions as it chooses if its consent is expressly sought. Thus—capable of being profitably used for transportation and commerce for about 2½ months each season, but that since 1875 it has not been, and could not have been, profitably used for such purposes; that the river has been navigable for the purpose of floating logs and lumber for fifteen years prior to the commencement of this suit, for a distance of more than 25 miles above Crookston, as well as below. (9) "That at the time said dam was constructed, and ever since, said dam was provided with sluiceways of sufficient capacity, and so arranged, when one of them is open, as to permit logs, timber, and lumber to pass through the same without any unreasonable delay or hindrance, and that said dam is not, and never has been, an unreasonable obstruction or impediment to the navigation of said river for the purposes of floating logs or lumber when the said sluiceways, or one of them, is open." (11) That about June 6, 1899, respondent did wrongfully drive and allow to be driven a number of about 24,000 logs from a point above said dam to a point below it, and, in driving said logs, did permit and cause them to run in large quantities to and over the dam, and over the crest of the same, instead of through the sluiceways provided for such purposes by appellant, although respondent at that time knew of the sluiceways, and knew that running of said logs over the crest of the dam, instead of through or over the sluiceways, was liable to injure the dam and the business of appellant, which acts of respondent in so driving, and allowing the said drive to be made, were done negligently and carelessly, and without reasonable care and prudence on the part of said defendant to prevent unnecessary injuries to the dam and appellant's business. (12) That, by reason of such negligent acts of respondent in so driving and permitting the logs to go over the crest of the dam, it was battered, broken, and weakened, all of which injuries and damages were caused by the negligence of respondent as aforesaid. (13, 14) That the injuries so occasioned by respondent in driving the logs over the dam amounted to $3,450. (15) "That during the month of June, 1899, plaintiff had not facilities for opening said sluiceways, or any of them, when the water was running more than 2 feet over the crest of the dam, without considerable danger to the lives of those using what plaintiff provided for the purpose of opening the sluiceways, and the said dam was wholly unprovided with any boom, piers, or instruments or means whereby to guide the logs floating in said stream to any sluiceway or channel, and that plaintiff was guilty of negligence in so failing to provide proper facilities for opening said sluiceways, and was guilty of negligence in failing to provide sheer booms, or some means whereby to guide the logs floating in the stream to one or more of the said sluiceways; that at the time defendant drove his logs over said dam as aforesaid, and during all the month of June, 1899, the water of said river was running more than 2½ feet high over the crest of said dam; that one sluiceway in said dam was open 1 foot at the top, and the other 2 feet at the top, each sluiceway being 8 feet wide and 5 feet deep from the crest of the dam when fully open and cleared of stop logs; that said openings of 1 foot in one sluiceway and 2 feet deep in the other, at the then stage of the water, were sufficient to enable defendant to get his logs past the dam by way of the sluiceways, and without any injury to the dam, and, knowing as he did, that plaintiff had not provided any means of guiding the logs to the sluiceways, he (the defendant) was guilty of negligence in not doing it, and this negligence was a proximate cause of the injury before stated; but plaintiff knew for two weeks before defendant drove his logs past the dam that he was going to do it, and failed to provide sheer booms or other means to guide the logs to the sluiceways, or one of them, and this failure on its part was negligence, which was a proximate cause of the injury, and contributed to it."

Under the authority given a power company by the legislature and by act of Congress to construct a dam across the Mississippi river, providing that it shall so construct the works as to provide for the free passage of saw logs, rafts, and boats, it is for the power company to do what is necessary to protect its dam from jams of logs floating down the river caused by the slack water which the dam creates; and if men are necessary for this purpose, it is for the company to employ them. St. Cloud Water-Power & Mill Co. v. Mississippi & R. River Boom Co. 43 Minn. 380, 45 N. W. 714.

Subject to the control of Congress in proper cases, and independently of statute, the right of riparian owners to construct, maintain, and operate dams upon rivers and streams in this state is firmly established by the decisions of this court. Morrill v. St. Anthony Falls Water-Power Co. 26 Minn. 222, 37 Am. Rep. 399, 2 N. W. 842; State v. Minneapolis Mill Co. 26 Minn. 229, 2 N. W. 839; Kretschmar v. Meehan, 74 Minn. 211, 77 N. W. 41; Minnesota Loan & T. Co. v. St. Anthony Falls Water-Power Co. 82 Minn. 505, 85 N. W. 520.

Title 1, chap. 32, Gen. Stat. 1894, recognizes the interests of riparian owners at the common law, and while declaring all rivers in the state public highways for the purpose of the passage of logs, timber, and lumber, the rights of riparian owners is also recognized and defined. Section 2385 reads: "All rivers within this state of sufficient size for floating or driving logs, timber, or lumber, and which may be used for that purpose, are hereby declared to be public highways, so far as to prevent obstructions to the free passage of logs, timber, or lumber down said streams, or either of them." And § 2386: "No dam or boom shall be constructed or permitted on any river, as herein specified, unless said dam or boom has connected therewith a sluiceway, lock, or fixture, sufficient and so arranged as to permit logs, timber, and lumber to pass around, through, or over said dam or boom, without unreasonable delay or hindrance." This act applies to all streams generally navigable, as well as what are termed mere floatable streams, and controls the respective rights of interested parties, subject to the acts of Congress and the Federal jurisdiction where applicable to streams generally navigable.

Assuming, therefore, that Red Lake river is a navigable stream, it not appearing that Congress has assumed any control over the river, and there being no apparent conflict between the state and Federal authority, it does not follow that the dam is a public nuisance because not authorized by Federal authority. Gould, Waters, 3d ed. §§ 129-132; Willson v. Black Bird Creek Marsh Co. 2 Pet. 245, 7 L. ed. 412; Pennsylvania v. Wheeling & B. Bridge Co. 13 How. 518, 14 L. ed. 249.

Our view of this legislation is that it was intended to recognize the rights of the riparian owner in the construction of the dam, and the public in the use of the stream, and that neither one is granted a paramount right. The 1st section declares that all streams of sufficient size to float logs, timber, and lumber are public highways; but the apparently unlimited authority to use such a stream is restricted in the 2d section by a further statement that the riparian owner may improve the stream for his own use, provided he does not unreasonably hinder or delay the passage of logs, timber, and lumber around, through, or over any dam that is constructed. In the case before us, appellant was authorized to construct and maintain the dam, provided it was equipped with sluiceways to admit of the passage of logs without unreasonable delay, and respondent was entitled to the use of the stream for the passage of his logs; and, if the sluiceways were so arranged, then respondent was required to direct and drive his logs through the sluiceways, and thus avoid injury to the dam. So it comes down to a question of whether the dam was properly equipped with sluiceways and appurtenances, such as not to unreasonably delay floating logs through the same, and, if so, whether respondent was in the exercise of reasonable care in driving his logs. While the findings of fact are apparently conflicting, we think that a close examination of the same, when taken into consideration with the conclusion of the court, will show that they are consistent and support the conclusion of law.

The ninth finding of fact is relied upon by appellant as conclusive upon the point that the dam was properly equipped with sluiceways, so as not to unreasonably delay or hinder the passage of logs. We think, when considered with the other findings and the legal conclusion of the court, that it is not so far-reaching. It will be observed from the ninth finding that the court has reference to the construction of the dam proper without taking into account any appurtenances for the purpose of directing the logs into the sluiceways. So far as the dam itself is concerned it is not an obstruction to the passage of logs because suitable sluiceways were provided, so that, when one or two of the stop boards were out, unreasonable delay was not occasioned to the passage of the logs. It is not to be understood that the finding includes the proper piling or other arrangement necessary for the purpose of guiding logs through the sluiceways. This finding must be considered with that part of the fifteenth to the effect that during the time in question the water running over the dam was more than 2½ feet deep, that there were no facilities for opening the sluiceways without considerable danger, and that the dam was not provided with piers, posts, or other means by which logs might be guided into the sluiceways. These findings are not inconsistent, and, when considered together, mean that appellant constructed the dam with proper sluiceways, but, in failing to provide some means whereby logs might be directed into the sluiceways, their transportation through the same was unreasonably hindered. So much as to appellant's duties.

In the fifteenth finding, it is found that an opening in one of the sluiceways of 1, and in the other of 2, feet in depth, at the then stage of the water, was sufficient to enable respondent to get his logs past the dam and through the sluiceways without injury to the dam, and knowing, as he did, that appellant had not provided any means of getting the logs into the sluiceways, he was guilty of negligence in not doing so himself. By the eleventh finding, to the same effect, that in running the logs over the crest of the dam, instead of through or over the sluiceways, respondent knew injury was liable to result to the dam, and that such acts were not performed in a careful and prudent manner, and so as to prevent harm to the dam. These findings are relied upon by appellant as sufficient to fix the liability of respondent. If, notwithstanding the fact that appellant had not equipped the dam with proper appurtenances or approaches, yet, knowing the real condition, respondent permitted the logs to go over the crest of the dam, then in the performance of such act he was called upon to exercise reasonable care and prudence to avoid injury to the dam. If the findings referred to are to the effect that, notwithstanding the failure of appellant to properly equip the sluiceways, yet respondent carelessly and negligently drove his logs over the dam, and unnecessarily caused the injuries complained of, when, with reasonable care and prudence, injury might have been avoided, he would be liable. But we do not think such is the necessary or proper inference, for there is no evidence to indicate that respondent was not in the exercise of reasonable care. What the court must have had in mind is that if it was the legal duty of respondent to supply sheer booms and direct his logs through the sluiceways, notwithstanding the fact that there were no fixed appurtenances to which booms could be attached, then, in allowing the logs to go over the dam indiscriminately, without any control or direction, he was guilty of negligence. In other words, the trial court assumed the possibility upon this appeal that this court might hold it was the legal duty of respondent to furnish such sheer booms or appliances, and in that case, from the facts found, the conclusion would follow that he was liable for the damages resulting. On the other hand, the court assumed that, if this court should coincide with its view of the law, then the facts found with respect to appellant's duties in the construction of the dam would justify such a conclusion.

We are not aware that there is any decision in this state defining the relative rights of those using a stream as a highway for the transportation of logs, and the riparian owner who has improved the stream for manufacturing purposes; but, as between different riparian owners, the rule is that the parties are limited to a reasonable use, with due regard to the rights and necessities of all others interested. What is a reasonable use depends upon the circumstances of each particular case. See Red River Roller Mills v. Wright, 30 Minn. 249, 44 Am. Rep. 194, 15 N. W. 167. In Page v. Mills Lacs Lumber Co. 53 Minn. 492, 55 N. W. 608, 1119, a controversy arose between different parties engaged in the business of driving logs upon the same stream, and the same rule was applied. With equal reason the rule of reasonable use should apply with respect to the relative rights of appellant and respondent, even in the absence of the statutory declarations already referred to. According to the evidence and findings of fact, Red Lake river had been used for many years for the transportation of logs. Appellant and its predecessors were required to take notice of the conditions liable to arise at the period of the year when logs were commonly transported. It is a matter of common knowledge that logs in the northern part of this state are cut and banked upon the streams during the winter season, and in the spring, when the waters are swollen by the melting snow and rains, they are floated to the places of destination. This flood period, during which only it is possible to float logs, exists generally during the months of May and June. When the dam in question was constructed, and the sluiceways put in, the builders were required to anticipate that during the log-driving season the waters would be high, and that during such period the current would be swift over the dam and sluiceways, and that something more might be required than a mere opening, to afford passage for logs without unreasonable delay. Moreover, experience for a number of years should have called appellant's attention to the fact, as found by the court, that, when the water was 2½ feet deep over the crest of the dam, it was an exceedingly difficult and dangerous task to take out the sluice boards sufficiently to lower the water so that the logs would not pass over the dam, and difficult, if at all feasible, to fix sheer booms for the purpose of directing the logs through the sluiceways. Under those conditions, it was practically impossible for respondent, without great inconvenience and delay, to attach sheer booms or take out enough of the sluice boards; and having called upon appellant, as the findings disclose, to make preparation for the passage of the logs, respondent did all that was reasonably required of him to do under the circumstances. It might be that at a lower stage of the water, or under other conditions, the dam, as constructed, would be sufficient to meet the requirements. We do not intend to hold that under all circumstances it is the duty of the riparian owner who erects a dam to provide sheer booms and to keep them in place, or that he is required to assume control of the logs, and conduct them through the sluiceways. It is simply held that, under the facts in this case, the dam should have been equipped with piling, or permanent fixtures of some kind, which could be reached, and to which sheer booms could be attached by respondent, or some means should have been provided for removing the sluice boards so that the current of water through the sluiceways would be sufficient to draw the logs through the same, or some other provision made equally efficient to accomplish the purpose. We have not overlooked the case of St. Cloud Water Power & Mill Co. v. Mississippi & R. River Boom Co. 43 Minn. 380, 45 N. W. 714. In that case an act of Congress was construed, and the rule of reasonable use was not taken into consideration.

Judgment affirmed.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, the following Per Curiam response was handed down April 22, 1904:

A rehearing was ordered in this case upon the following questions:

1. Did the trial court, in holding by the eleventh finding of fact that respondent wrongfully and negligently drove the logs over the crest of the dam instead of through the sluiceways, have reference to the condition of the dam, sluiceways, and depth of the water as then existing, or did the court have in mind the neglect of respondent to furnish sheer booms, conceding it to be his duty to furnish them?

2. Is there sufficient evidence in the case to sustain the eleventh finding of fact?

3. If the eleventh finding of fact refers to the condition of the dam at the time the logs were driven over it, was respondent liable for the resulting injury?

The matter having been fully reargued, it is ordered that the former order of this court affirming the judgment be, and the same hereby is, set aside, and a new trial granted.

It will not be advisable at this time to further discuss the principles of law involved in this case. The appeal having been taken upon the ground that the findings of fact did not justify the order for judgment, the court endeavored to reconcile what it deemed to be rather indefinite and inconsistent findings. From a re-examination of the evidence and findings, we are now satisfied that the task the court assumed at that time was hardly justified, and we have concluded to remand the case for a new trial upon the ground that the findings of fact do not support the order for judgment, and do not justify an order for judgment for appellant.

TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

Nellie McKELVEY, by Next Friend, Appf.,
v.

W. J. McKELVEY et al.

(.....Tenn.....)

A child has no right of action to recover damages against his father and stepmother for cruel and inhuman treatment inflicted upon him by the latter with the consent of the former.

(November 14, 1903.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Marion County in defendants' favor in an action brought to recover damages for cruel and inhuman treatment inflicted upon plaintiff by defendants. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. B. A. Heard and C. C. Moore for appellant.

Messrs. B. Pope, Jephtha Bright, and Tatum Thach for appellees.

Beard, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit instituted by a minor child, by next friend, against her father and stepmother, seeking to recover damages for cruel and inhuman treatment alleged to have been inflicted upon her by the latter at the instance and with the consent of the father.

NOTE.—As to right of minor child to maintain action against parent for wrongful confinement in insane asylum, see, in this series, Hawlett v. George, 13 L. R. A. 682. 64 L. R. A.

Upon demurrer the suit was dismissed, and, the case being properly brought to this court, error is assigned upon this action of the trial judge.

We think there was no error in this dismissal. At common law the right of the father to the control and custody of his infant child grew out of the corresponding duty on his part to maintain, protect, and educate it. These rights could only be forfeited by gross misconduct on his part. The right to control involved the subordinate right to restrain and inflict moderate chastisement upon the child. In case parental power was abused, the child had no civil remedy against the father for the personal injuries inflicted. Whatever redress was afforded in such case was to be found in an appeal to the criminal law and in the remedy furnished by the writ of habeas corpus. So far as we can discover, this rule of the common law has never been questioned in any of the courts of this country, and certainly no such action as the present has been maintained in these courts. It is true that no less celebrated an authority than Judge Cooley, in the second edition of his work on Torts, at page 171, observes that "in principle there seems to be no reason it should not be sustained." No case, however, is cited in support of this text. In fact, the only case which the diligence of counsel has been able to find in which this particular question has been discussed is that of Hewlett v. George, 68 Miss. 703, 13 L. R. A. 682, 9 So. 885. It is there said: "So long as the parent is under obligation to care for, guide, and control, and the child is under reciprocal obligation to aid and comfort and obey, no such action as this can be maintained. The peace of society, and of the families composing society, and a sound public policy designed to subserve the repose of families and the best interests of society, forbid to the minor child a right to appear in court in the assertion of a claim to civil redress for personal injuries suffered at the hands of the parent. The state, through its criminal laws, will give the minor children protection from parental violence and wrongdoing, and this is all the child can be heard to demand."

The fact that the cruel treatment in this case was inflicted by a stepmother can make no difference, for, whether inflicted in the presence of the father or not, if the action could be maintained at all, he would be responsible for the tort. If inflicted in his presence, he alone would be responsible, nothing appearing to repel the presumption that it was the result of his coercion; if out of his presence, then he and she would be jointly liable for the wrong. So at last it comes back to the question as to the right of a minor child to institute a civil action against the father for wrongs inflicted upon it.

An analogy is furnished in the relation of husband and wife. It has been held that neither husband nor wife can maintain an action against the other for wrongs committed during coverture. This holding rests in part upon their unity by virtue of the marriage relation, which would preclude the one from suing the other at law, and in part upon the respective rights and duties involved in that relation. In Abbott v. Abbott, 67 Me. 304, 24 Am. Rep. 27, it was held that a wife could not, even after being divorced from her husband, maintain an action against him for an assault committed upon her during coverture, nor against persons who assisted him in making the assault. As was said by the court, at common law the husband was the guardian of the wife, and was bound to protect and maintain her, and on that ground "the law gave him a reasonable superiority and control over her person, authorizing him to put gentle restraints upon her liberty if her conduct were such as to require it." 2 Kent, Com. 180. In view of the evolution of the law in the amelioration of the married woman's condition, and the comparative independence that was now secured to her, it was insisted in that case that the action should be maintained. To this, however, the court replied: "We are not convinced that it is desirable to have the law as the plaintiff contends it to be. There is no necessity for it. Practically the married woman has remedy enough. . . . She has the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus if unlawfully restrained. As a last resort, if need be, she can prosecute, at the husband's expense, a suit for divorce."

In Phillips v. Barnett, L. R. 1 Q. B. Div. 436, the same rule is announced, although it was insisted there, as in the case from Maine, that, the marriage relation having ceased by divorce, the wife should be let in to her action for damages against the former husband for personal injuries inflicted upon her during coverture; the argument being that the relation simply suspended the right of action, and, this relation having been terminated, the right was then in a condition to be enforced. But it was there said, as in the first case, that the error in this insistence was in supposing that a right of action ever existed; that there was no civil remedy, either during or after coverture, because there was no civil right to be redressed.

We think that the circuit judge acted in obedience to a well-settled rule controlling the relation of father and child, and in furtherance of a sound public policy, in sustaining the demurrer to the declaration in this case, and his judgment is affirmed.

The building, sale, and repairing of vessels employed in commerce is held to be within the provisions of a statute permitting bankruptcy proceedings to be instituted against corporations engaged principally in manufacturing and mercantile pursuits. (C. C. A. 6th C.) 645.

Highways.

See also infra, VII.

The owner of trees in a highway is held to have no right of action for the necessary trimming of them for the installation of an electric-lighting system for the municipality, which has full authority to establish the same, and full jurisdiction over the highway within its limits. (Miss.) 805.

Trees which have been standing for forty years without impeding the travel on a public highway are held not to be nuisances because they extend a few inches outside the curb on a proposed plan for the improvement of the street, where the curb can be so arranged as to carry water flowing in the gutter around them, so that it will not interfere with the flow of the water, or the improvement of the street in a workmanlike manner. (Md.) 627.

Taxes.

The right to assess a succession tax at the death of the testator upon the corpus of the estate is denied where the property is devised in trust, which shall continue for a period of twenty years, during which time annuities shall be paid to certain persons named, among whom the estate shall be distributed at the expiration of that period if they are alive at that time, and, if they are not alive, among persons whom they shall appoint and certain persons named by the testator, under a statute authorizing a tax against a person who "shall become beneficially entitled, in possession or expectation, to any property or income thereof," when the tax rate differs according to the relationship to the testator of the person who ultimately becomes entitled to the property. (Ill.) 775.

The power to tax the exercise of a power of appointment by will is held not to be destroyed by the fact that the power of appointment was created by deed prior to the passage of the statute providing for the tax. (N. Y.) 279.

A claim on a policy insuring the life of one who dies before the day on which property is to be valued for taxation is held to be assessable under a statute providing for the assessment of claims due or to become due, although proof of death has not been made, and the insurer has sixty days after such proof in which to pay the demand. (Ill.) 72.

A constitutional declaration that "property," for the purpose of taxation, shall include franchises, is held to authorize taxation of the right to exist as a corporation. (Cal.) 918.

An establishment for the collection and distribution of electricity for the purpose of power and light is held not to be for manufacturing purposes, within the meaning of a statute permitting towns to exempt manufacturing establishments from taxation. (N. H.) 33.

Municipal corporations; ordinances.

A municipal corporation is held to have no power to contract to pay a water company for a supply a sum annually in perpetuity equal to 5 cents on the $100 of the "present valuation of assessment," under a statute authorizing it to levy annually a tax not exceeding 5 cents on the $100 of assessed property. (Md.) 630.

Mere acceptance of, and payment for, the service of a water company in furnishing water for general fire purposes are held not to be sufficient to establish a contract on the part of the water company to compensate the municipality for loss of property by fire, for the extinguishment of which the company negligently failed to furnish water, although the service was undertaken in compliance with a demand therefor by the municipality. (Cal.) 231.

A municipal ordinance prohibiting the maintenance of a dairy within the city limits is held not to deprive citizens of property without due process of law, or to abridge their privileges or immunities. (Mo.) 679.

Inspecting books of municipality.

A citizen and taxpayer is held to be entitled to make a general examination of the books of the municipal corporation when it is shown to be important to the public interests that such examination be made. (Tenn.) 418.

Waters.

The state is held not to abrogate its trust by granting to a municipality the shore of a tidal body of water within its limits. (Ala.) 333.

The fact that a municipality takes its water supply from a lake is held not to justify the denial, through the police power, of the right of an upper riparian owner to bathe in the lake. (Mich.) 265.

Sunday laws.

A law which prohibits the keeping open of butcher shops for the sale of meats, and other business places, on any portion of Sunday, while it authorizes confectionery and tobacco to be sold in an orderly manner on that day, is held not to be an unreasonable discrimination between these several occupations, so as to be in violation of the Constitution prohibiting special or class legislation. (Minn.) 510.

The repairing of a belt in a factory so as to prevent 200 hands from losing a day's work the following day is held to be within an exception to a Sunday law permitting works of necessity on that day, where the defect was not discovered until too late to repair it on Saturday with the appliances at hand, and the owner of the mill was not negligent in not having foreseen the accident, or having appliances at hand to repair it immediately. (Ark.) 204.

Dedication.

Land dedicated as a public highway is held not to revert to the dedicators because of misuse or nonuse, unless its use for the dedicated purpose has become impossible, or so highly improbable as to be practically impossible. (Kan.) 85.

Executors and administrators.

The right of the probate court, in its discretion, to allow an administrator a reasonable amount to compensate for the services of a real-estate broker who succeeded in securing for the property belonging to the estate a materially greater amount than was bid for it at the attempted auction sale, is sustained. (Cal.) 554.

Officers.

A county officer is held not to be required to account for and pay over to his county, money received by him in payment for services performed for another, by private agreement, which are no part of the duties of his office, and which are not incompatible with, and are not included within, his official duties. (Neb.) 131.

Reward.

The vote buyer is held to have no right to claim the reward offered by a statute providing that one who furnishes information resulting in the conviction of a person for selling his vote shall be entitled to a reward. (Ind.) 780.

Libel.

A statute limiting the recovery, in an action for libel against a newspaper publisher, to actual damages only, where it appears on the trial that the article was published in good faith, and that, within a specified time after service of notice by the party libeled of his intention to bring an action specifying the statement alleged to be libelous, a full and fair retraction was published in as conspicuous a place and type in such newspaper as was the alleged libelous article, is held to be void as denying the constitutional right to a remedy by due process of law for an injury suffered. (Kan.) 790.

Attorneys' fees.

A mechanics' lien law which provides that, in an action brought by any artisan or day laborer to enforce any lien under the act, where judgment is rendered for plaintiff, he shall be entitled to recover a reasonable attorneys' fee to be fixed by the court, which shall be taxed as costs in the action, is held to be unconstitutional and void, as a denial of the equal protection of the laws. (Kan.) 325.

Insurance.

A statute providing that insurance policies shall not be avoided for the falsity of representations or warranties, unless made with intent to deceive, or increasing the risk of loss, is held to be within the police power; and it is held to be immaterial that it applies only to policies issued by old-line companies, and not to those issued on the assessment plan. (Tenn.) 451.

Prohibiting the use of a room in a tenement or dwelling house for the manufacture of men's clothing, except by the immediate members of the family living there, and then only under permit from a public official, is held to be within the police power. (Md.) 637.

Preference of veterans.

A statute providing that those who have served in the Army and Navy of the United States in the War of the Rebellion, and have been honorably discharged therefrom, shall be preferred for appointment to office in every public department and upon all public works of the state and of the cities and towns thereof, is held to be constitutional. (Kan.) 945.

II. CONTRACTUAL AND COMMERCIAL RELATIONS.

Contracts; validity.

The refusal of a court to entertain a suit to charge a person on an unsigned representation as to the credit of another person is sustained, although it is valid where made, if the statute of the place where the suit is brought provides that no action shall be brought to charge one on such a representation, unless it is in writing, signed by the party to be charged thereon. (Mich.) 119.

A contract by one selling the right to manufacture and sell a machine which he has devised, not to engage in the business of making such machines himself, nor grant anyone else the right to do so, during the life of the contract, is held not to be void as against public policy, where possible customers are limited in number and scattered throughout the country. (N. H.) 298.

Contract for permanent employment.

Employment for a year is held to be a fulfilment of a contract to give an attorney permanent employment in consideration of services rendered in the formation of a corporation, since the contract is indefinite and terminable at the will of either party. (Mich.) 673.

Banks.

A bank which receives from an agent for deposit in his own name the money of his principal, without notice of the agency, is held to be protected, in applying it to a past-due debt of the depositor, to the same extent as in paying it out upon his checks, whenever such application is authorized by the agent, either expressly or by legal implication. (Kan.) 785.

Bills and notes.

Transactions of a broker which become the basis of a note given by his principal, and which are performed in one state where the note is delivered under directions of the principal by telephone or letter from another state, are held to be judged, for the purpose of determining the validity of the R. A.

consideration for the note, by the law of the place where the broker performed them. (R. I.) 160.

An indorsee of a negotiable note taken as collateral security for a pre-existing debt, there being no extension of time of payment or other new consideration, is held to be a holder for value and in due course of business; and, in the absence of any circumstances charging him with notice, to be protected against a claim of payment made to the original payee. (Kan.) 568.

Carriers.

One consigning goods to his agents in another city, for sale, is held to be bound to take notice of a certain well-established and general custom in force there, that business will be suspended on a certain holiday, so that he cannot hold the carrier liable for failure to make delivery of the consignment on that day. (Tenn.) 443.

Exclusive privilege to teamster at depot.

The right of a railroad company to give one teamster an exclusive right to enter upon the railroad property to solicit the privilege of carrying the baggage of passengers, and to exclude others from its grounds, is sustained where the reasonable requirements of passengers are thereby fully met. (N. H.) 811.

Insurance.

See also supra, I.

The incapacity of a man's administrator to receive the proceeds of a policy on his life, which had been assigned to his wife, because he wilfully took her life, is held not to cause their escheat to the state; but it is held that they will pass to her distributees as though the husband had never been in existence. (Tenn.) 458.

Accidental death of an assured, resulting from taking poison to frighten his wife into giving him money, is held not to be within the provision of the policy that it does not include assurance against self-destruction or suicide. (Mich.) 663.

1. Where an insurance company pays to the insured a loss occasioned by the wrong of a third party, and the value of the property destroyed exceeds the amount paid by the insurance company, the insured may bring an action in his own name against the wrongdoer, and may recover the full amount of the loss. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. v. Blaker (Kan.) 81

2. A child has no right of action to recover damages against his father and step-mother for cruel and inhuman treatment inflicted upon him by the latter with the consent of the former. McKelvey v. McKelvey (Tenn.) 991

3. The owner of goods may dictate the prices at which he will sell them, and the damages which are caused to an applicant to buy, by the refusal of the owner to sell to him at prices which will enable him to resell them at a profit, constitute no legal injury, and are not actionable, because they are not the result of any breach of duty or of con- 1007 tract by the owner. Whitwell v. Continental Tobacco Co. (C. C. App. 8th C.) 689

4. Members of a combination to enhance the price of a commodity, which is void under the anti-trust act, who share in the profits secured by the combination, cannot claim exemption from suit on the part of a consumer under the provisions of the statute, on the ground that no direct purchase was made from them, nor complain that all the members of the combination were not made parties to the action. Atlanta v. Chattanooga Foundry & Pipeworks (C. C. App. 8th C.) 721

Who may maintain.

5. An agent who has made a contract for the sale of his principal's property, for which he is to receive a commission, has sufficient interest in a telegram which he sends to the principal for the purpose of having the sale confirmed, to be entitled to maintain an action for failure of the telegraph company to perform its contract. Western Union Teleg. Co. v. Barefoot (Tex.) 491

6. One holding by written assignment a verified itemized account is not the real party in interest, within the meaning of Kan. Civ. Code, § 26, requiring every action to be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, and he cannot maintain an action thereon in his own name, where it is shown that by a contemporaneous oral agreement he has agreed to pay the full amount thereof, when collected, to his assignor; and this is true notwithstanding the assignor testifies that the defendant in the action does not owe her anything, and that the whole amount is due her from the plaintiff, and that he is to pay her provided he recovers in the action. Stewart v. Price (Kan.) 581

7. An action will lie on behalf of a quarry owner against members of a voluntary association of dealers in stone of which he is not a member, who enforce a by-law of the association imposing a fine upon members who deal with those who are not members, so that members who desire to deal with nonmembers are coerced from doing so, to the ruination of the business of the quarry owner. Martell v. White (Mass.) 260

8. A municipal corporation engaged in the business of supplying water to its inhabitants for profit, which is injured in the purchase of necessary supplies by a combination among producers which is invalid under the anti-trust act, is entitled to maintain an action for redress under the provisions of that act. Atlanta v. Chattanooga Foundry & Pipeworks (C. C. App. 8th C.) 721

9. That a consumer injured in the purchase of supplies by a combination, illegal under the anti-trust act, is not engaged in an interstate business, does not deprive it of a right of action under the provisions of that act. Id.

Abatement.

10. A suit by a municipal corporation does not abate by the repeal of its charter and the substitution for the old corporation of a new one with substantially the same inhabitants and locality. Mobile Transportation Co. v. Mobile (Ala.) 333

Dismissal.

11. A suit instituted by the next friend of one alleged to be of unsound mind need not be dismissed in case such person appears by attorney, protests that he is of sound mind, and moves to dismiss the bill; but the court may determine whether or not it should retain jurisdiction by investigating complainant's mental condition. Isle v. Cranby (Ill.) 513

APPEAL AND ERROR.

1. A motion for new trial is not the sole remedy to cure an error in the amendment of a decree of a probate court allowing compensation to a broker who had rendered services to an estate, so as to make the allowance to the administrator, but the question is open upon appeal from a decree settling the account and ordering distribution of the estate. Re Willard's Estate (Cal.) 554

Appellate jurisdiction.

2. An appellate court is not deprived of jurisdiction of a cause by failure to get it into that court for the term specified in the notice of appeal. Hoff v. Shockley (Iowa) 538

3. The allowance of an appeal within the time prescribed by law is sufficient to remove the case to the appellate court, although the appeal is not perfected by the filing of the bond and issuance of service of citation within that time. Columbia Iron & L. R. A. 64

Works v. National Lead Co. (C. C. App. 6th C.) 645

4. The question of the jurisdiction of a district court is not involved, so as to require the appeal to be taken to the Supreme Court of the United States rather than to the circuit court of appeals, in the determination that a corporation is principally engaged in such a business that it can be adjudged a bankrupt. Id.

Record.

5. Leave to file a supplemental record in support of a petition for rehearing will not be granted to bring up proceedings of the trial court which occurred subsequent to the final judgment, if the matters were all within the knowledge of the plaintiff in error before the original bill of exceptions was approved and signed. Clipper Min. Co. v. Eli Min. & L. Co. (Colo.) 209

Objections.

6. An objection that a hypothetical question "is not a proper" one, is too general to raise any question for a review by the appellate court. Longan v. Weltmer (Mo.) 969

Questions not raised below.

7. A party cannot complain of a general instruction on the measure of damages which is correct as far as it goes, unless he calls the court's attention to the matter, and requests a limitation of the general language used. Id.

Discretionary decision.

8. The courts will not revise the honest judgment of the officials to whom is committed the assessment for taxation of the franchises of a corporation in fixing the taxable value of such franchises. Bank of California v. San Francisco (Cal.) 918

Review of verdict or finding.

9. To justify an inference that the amount of damages awarded by the jury was not the result of fair and unprejudiced consideration the facts in evidence should be such that no other conclusion can be entertained. Longan v. Weltmer (Mo.) 969

10. A finding of fact by the jury cannot be reversed by the supreme court on appeal, although it appears to be against the preponderance of evidence, if there is evidence to support it which cannot be said to be incredible, and it cannot be said that all the reasonable probabilities and inferences are against their conclusion. Busse v. Rogers (Wis.) 183

11. The court will not interfere with an award of $3,000 as damages for injuries to a competent lineman of an electric light company earning at the time of injury $60 per month, where he had been able to do but little work prior to the trial, which occurred about a year after the injury, and there was evidence which would justify a conclusion that he had not at that time recovered from the effect of the accident. Twombly v. Consolidated Electric Light Co. (Me.) 551

Ground for reversal.

12. Error in sustaining a demurrer of a party disclaiming any interest in the litigation is not sufficient to justify a reversal and remanding of the cause for the purpose of allowing him to answer. Harding v. American Glucose Co. (Ill.) 738

13. Error in permitting consignees of dressed poultry to give their opinions that nothing was omitted to be done towards the proper handling of the poultry by them after receiving it, and that delay in delivery was not caused by anything they did or failed to do, does not require reversal of a judgment against the carrier for loss caused by delay in transportation, where it appears, from uncontradicted facts in the record, that the opinions were correct. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Naive (Tenn.) 443

14. When one attacking a patent to a mining location is permitted, against the objection of his adversary, to go behind the patent and introduce evidence as to the priority of location, he cannot complain if his adversary is permitted to introduce evidence showing that his own location is the prior one. Jefferson Min. Co. v. Anchoria-Leland Min. & M. Co. (Colo.) 925

15. The refusal of the court to instruct the jury as to assault is not error, where it appears that, if the defendant was guilty of any offense, it was one of a higher grade than a mere assault. State v. Ryno (Kan.) 303

16. An instruction by the court, where a defendant does not testify in his own behalf, that, "while the statute of this state provides that a person charged with crime may testify in his own behalf, he is under no obligation to do so, and the statute expressly declares that his neglect to testify shall not create any presumption against him,"— is not prejudicial error. Id.

17. Failure to give proper instructions as to contributory negligence, in an action to recover damages for wrongful death, is not reversible error, where there was no evidence upon which to base any instruction upon the subject. Louisville & E. Mail Co. v. Barnes (Ky.) 574

18. Refusal to give to the jury a requested instruction which is not strictly correct is not reversible error. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Naive (Tenn.) 443

19. A party cannot complain of the granting of prayers for his opponent which did not authorize a recovery of anything more than might be recovered under prayers offered by himself. Salabes v. Castelberg (Md.) 800

20. A decision awarding punitive damages must be reversed where, although they were allowable under the facts set out in the first count of the declaration, they were not asked for by it, but were asked for in another count under which no damages were allowable, where, from the instructions and the award, it is evident that they were allowed under the wrong count. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Harper (Miss.) 283

21. Error in refusing to retax costs after rendition of a judgment is no ground for reversal of the judgment. Mobile Transportation Co. v. Mobile (Ala.) 333

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Appeal; error in instructions which assume disputed facts. 970

Reversible error in refusing to require plaintiff to submit to physical examination; reversible error in admission of incompetent evidence. 90

Superiority over Chattel Mortgage Recorded in State from Which Chattels Brought, see CONFLICT OF LAWS, 7.

1. A fund which has, under the order of the court, been deposited with the clerk, does not become subject to attachment by the determination of the one who is entitled to receive it, and an order of the court that it be paid to him. Dale v. Brumbly (Md.) 112

2. A clerk of court is a public officer, within the rule that money is not subject to attachment in the hands of such officers. Id.

3. The liability of sureties on a contractor's bond is not for the direct payment of money, within the meaning of a statute authorizing an attachment in actions on contracts "for the direct payment of money." Ancient Order of Hibernians v. Sparrow (Mont.) 128

4. When the right of the principal defendant in case of an attachment sued out against a third person as garnishee is subject to a right of the garnishee under a contract between them, the right of the garnishor is likewise subject to the right of the garnishee. Wall v. Norfolk & W. R. Co. (W. Va.) 501

5. Rolling stock and all other movable property of a railroad company or corporation are subject to process of attachment, where the attachment is applicable, as well as to ordinary execution, under W. Va. Const. art. 11, § 8. Id.

6. A railroad car sent loaded with freight from another state into West Virginia, to be returned loaded to the former state, in the transaction of interstate commerce, cannot be levied upon under an attachment in West Virginia; nor will another railroad company having such cars in its possession in the process of carrying on interstate commerce be liable to garnishment by reason of its possession received from another company against which an attachment has been issued. Id.

7. Loaded cars in possession of a railroad company under an agreement with another, by which they are to be received at connecting points by the former company, and 64 L. R. A.

hauled over its line to the destination of load of the car, and then be reloaded with other freight by the receiving company on its line, and carried over its line, and returned loaded to the railroad of the owner of the cars, the receiving company compensating the owning company for such use of the cars,—cannot be seized under an attachment against the company owning the cars, so as to defeat the rights, under such arrangement or contract, of the company receiving and entitled to so use the cars; and a garnishment of the receiving company cannot affect its rights under such arrangements by reason of its possession of such cars. Id.

8. state, and subject to its laws. Succession of Welsh (La.) 823

2. Where an order for goods is taken by a drummer in one state, subject to the approval of his principal, and is transmitted to the principal in another state, and is there approved and there filled by the segregation and shipment of the goods, the sale is a contract of the domicile of the vendor, and does not give rise to a vendor's privilege on the goods, unless such privilege exists under the laws of such other state. Id.

3. The contract contained in a mutual benefit certificate, which requires the beneficiary to sign an acceptance of its provisions, is made where the contract is consummated by such acceptance, and subject to the laws there in force. Meyer v. Supreme Lodge K. of P. (N. Y.) 839

4. Transactions of a broker which become the basis of a note given by his principal, and which are performed in one state where the note is delivered under directions of the principal by telephone or letter from another state, are, for the purpose of determining the validity of the consideration for the note, to be judged by the law of the place where the broker performed them. Winward v. Lincoln (R. I.) 160

5. 7. A chattel mortgage duly recorded in one state will not, under the doctrine of comity, be given priority by the courts of another state, to which the chattels are removed, over local attaching creditors who had no actual notice of it. Snider v. Yates (Tenn.) 353

8. A court will not entertain a suit to charge a person on an unsigned representation as to the credit of another person, although it is valid where made, if the statute of the place where the suit is brought provides that no action shall be brought to charge one on such a representation, unless it is in writing, signed by the party to be charged thereon. *Third Nat. 2. The right to a remedy by due course of law is not satisfied by the requirement contained in a statute to make specific reparation for the injury done, which reparation is the same in all cases, and bears no relation to the injury suffered, and has not been decreed by a tribunal after ascertainment of the extent of such injury. Id.

3. A municipal ordinance prohibiting the maintenance of a dairy within the city limits neither deprives citizens of property without due process or law nor abridges their privileges or immunities. St. Louis v. Fischer (Mo.) 679

Equal protection and privileges.

4. A statute providing that those who have served in the Army and Navy of the United States in the War of the Rebellion, and have been honorably discharged therefrom, shall be preferred for appointment to office in every public department, and upon all public works of the state and of the cities and towns thereof, is constitutional. *Goodrich v. 5. The attempt to confer the exclusive right to treat all diseases, physical or mental, real or imaginary, upon licensed doctors, is unconstitutional. State v. Biggs (N. C.) 139

6. The provision for the recovery of a

Woodmansee* (Kan.) 325

7. A statute imposing a penalty upon a fire insurance company for refusal, in bad faith, to pay the amount due upon a policy, and also a like penalty upon an insured who institutes an action in bad faith, is not void as a special regulation of the business of insurance, which no differences between that and other kinds of business justify. Continental Fire Ins. Co. v. Whitaker (Tenn.) 451

8. That a corporation is engaged in a business which an individual might carry on without payment of any tax or license fee does not render the imposition of a tax upon its franchises an unlawful discrimination prohibited by U. S. Const. Amend. 14. Bank of California v. San Francisco (Cal.) 918

Police power.

9. The court cannot declare an act of the legislature which has a real and substantial relation to the police power void for unreasonableness. State v. Hyman (Md.) 637

10. The police power extends to prohibiting the use of a room in a tenement or dwelling house for the manufacture of men's clothing, except by the immediate members of the family living there, and then only under permit from a public official. Id.

11. Requiring a specified air space for every person employed in a manufacturing establishment is strictly and essentially a health regulation within the police power of the legislature. Id.

12. Persons giving out materials to be manufactured into men's clothing may be required to keep a register of those to whom they are given, to aid the public authorities in their supervision of the places where the work is done. Id.

13. The police power justifies legislation providing that insurance policies shall not be avoided for the falsity of representations or warranties, unless made with intent to deceive, or increasing the risk of loss; and it is immaterial that it is made to apply only to those issued by old-line companies, and not to those issued on the assessment plan. *Continental Fire Ins. Implied contract.

2. Mere acceptance of and payment for the service of a water company in furnishing water for general fire purposes are not sufficient to establish a contract on the part of the water company to compensate the municipality for loss of property by fire for the extinguishment of which the company negligently failed to furnish water, although the service was undertaken in compliance with a demand therefor by the municipality. Ukiah City v. Ukiah W. & I. Co. (Cal.) 231

Recovery on implied, as affected by express, contract.

3. An express agreement with the promoters of a corporation for compensation for services rendered for its benefit will not prevent reliance on an implied one to recover the value of the services from the corporation in case it accepts the benefit of the services but repudiates the agreement. Sullivan v. Detroit, Y. & A. A. R. Co. (Mich.) 673

Former requisites; statute of fraud.

4. A signed letter stating that the writer remembers "of exhibiting a statement" of another's resources is not sufficient to make the letter a signed statement of them, within the meaning of a statute providing that no action shall be brought on such a statement unless it is signed, where the statement on which the plaintiff relies was exhibited by a third person, and there is nothing in the letter to identify the one to which it refers, and by the terms of the letter the exhibited statement did not contain the whole substance of the communication upon the subject. Third Nat. Bank v. Steel (Mich.) 119

Construction.

5. A contract for a municipal water supply, which is void because perpetual and therefore in excess of the powers of the municipal corporation, cannot be construed to have been intended to exist merely for the lifetime of the water company, and to be valid because such term was not unreasonable. Westminster Water Co. v. Westminster (Md.) 630

Validity.

6. A contract by one selling his business not to engage in it again for a series of years within the territory where it could be profitably transacted is void as in general restraint of trade. Harding v. American Glucose Co. (Ill.) 738

7. A contract by one selling the right to manufacture and sell a machine which he has devised, not to engage in the business of making such machines himself, nor grant anyone else the right to do so during the life of the contract, is not void as against public policy, where possible customers are limited in number and scattered throughout the country. Bancroft v. Union Embossing Co. (N. H.) 298

manufacture of machinery under patterns, the right to use which is sold to the other contracting party, is not invalidated by the act of Congress of July 2, 1890, prohibiting restraints of trade and commerce among the several states and with foreign nations. Id.

9. A transaction by which a broker, upon orders of his customer, actually purchases stocks in good faith and with the intention that they shall be delivered upon demand, is not void as a wager at common law, although the stocks are not in fact paid for by, or delivered to, the customer, who has no intention of receiving them, but are held by the broker, who either borrows or advances the purchase money upon the security of the stock, and holds them until ordered by the customer to sell them. Winward v. Lincoln (R. I.) 160

Grounds for rescission.

10. That the belief of the parties to a contract for the exclusive right to manufacture machines of a certain pattern that the principal feature in the machine was patentable proves to be erroneous is not such a failure of consideration as will entitle the one obtaining the right to make the machines to rescind the contract, since the rights of the parties are to be governed by the terms of the contract, and their belief as to the rights obtained is immaterial. Bancroft v. Union Embossing Co. (N. H.) 298

Performance.

11. Employment for a year is a fulfillment of a contract to give an attorney permanent employment in consideration of services rendered in the formation of a corporation, since the contract is indefinite and terminable at the will of either party. *Sullivan v. Powers.

1. A corporation, being a creature of the law, has no powers which the law has not conferred upon it. National Home B. & L. Asso. v. Home Sav. Bank (Ill.) 399

2. The increase of stock is not within the implied powers of a corporation. Cooke v. Marshall (Pa.) 413

3. That a foreign corporation doing business in the state has power, under its charter, to relinquish the transaction of a branch of its business, does not authorize it to enter into a trust combination, or sell property required for the transaction of its business in violation of the local laws, or deprive the local courts of the power to see that the 64 L. R. A.

business transacted in the state shall not be disposed of in such a way as to violate the local statutes. Harding v. American Glucose Co. (Ill.) 738

4. The implied powers which a corporation has in order to carry into effect those expressly granted, and to accomplish the purposes of its creation, are not limited to such as are indispensable for these purposes, but comprise all that are necessary, in the sense of appropriate, convenient, and suitable, including the right of reasonable choice of means to be employed. Central Ohio N. G. & F. Co. v. Capital City Dairy Co. (Ohio St.) 395

5. Where a corporation formed for the purpose of manufacturing and dealing in a particular line of goods, instead of incurring the delay and expense incident to the construction of a new manufacturing plant and building up of an independent business, in good faith, with a view of promoting the interests of the corporation, chooses to purchase of an existing partnership engaged in a like business its established plant and assets, including its outstanding claims, among which is one for damages to the property caused by another's negligence, the corporation acquires a valid title to the claim for damages, as against the party liable, and may maintain an action thereon. Id.

6. Incidental or implied powers of a corporation exist only to enable it to carry out the express powers granted,—that is, to accomplish the purpose of its existence,—and can in no case avail to enlarge the express powers and thereby warrant it to devote its efforts and capital to other purposes than such as its charter expressly authorizes, or to engage in collateral enterprises not directly, but only remotely, connected with its specific corporate purposes. People ex rel. Moloney v. Pullman's Palace Car Co. (Ill.) 366

7. The ownership of an office building near the business center of a city, by a manufacturing corporation, does not exceed its incidental powers merely because the building is larger than its needs for present use, and a part of it is therefore rented, if it is probable that the whole building will be needed for its own business in the future. Id.

8. The ownership, by a manufacturing corporation, of a town or city of more than 2,000 houses, with streets, alleys, sewer system, dwellings, tenement houses, churches, hotel, schools, theater, and business buildings, no one of which is occupied by any other than a tenant of the corporation, is contrary to public policy, and in excess of the implied powers of the corporation. Id.

9. The ownership of a sewerage system, and of a sewerage farm on which vegetables are raised for sale, is not within the implied powers of a corporation because of the necessity of sewerage for a town owned by it, when the ownership of such town is in excess of its powers. Id.

10. Whiskies, wines, beers, and other malt and intoxicating liquors are included in the "supplies" which the charter of a corporation engaged in manufacturing and selling or using cars authorizes it to furnish to travelers on them. Id.

11. Vacant land may be held by a corporation when necessary for use in its business in the near future. Id.

12. Vacant lots kept for future dwellings cannot be owned by a corporation in the exercise of its implied powers, when they constitute part of a tract on which the corporation has built a town in excess of its powers. Id.

13. A sale of surplus steam by a corporation is not in excess of its powers when the steam is generated in the course of its business by boilers larger than are needed for its present uses, but which are bought in anticipation of probable future necessities. Id.

14. A corporation cannot become a stockholder in another corporation unless power to do so is specifically granted in its charter, or necessarily implied from it. Id.

15. The report of a legislative committee, that the property of a corporation is properly taxed, does not amount to a concession on the part of the state that the corporation had a right to acquire the title to the property. Id.

Contracts.

16. A contract of a corporation which is beyond its corporate powers and ultra vires in the strict and legitimate sense, and against public policy, cannot be made binding on the corporation by way of estoppel. National Home B. & L. Asso. v. Home Sav. Bank (Ill.) 399

17. A party dealing with a corporation having limited and delegated powers conferred by law is chargeable with notice of them and their limitations, and cannot plead ignorance in avoidance of the defense of ultra vires. Id.

18. Acts of a corporation, which, if standing alone, or engaged in as a business, would be beyond its implied powers, are not necessarily ultra vires when they are incidental to, or form part of, an entire transaction that, in its general scope, is within the corporate purpose. Central Ohio N. G. 64 L. R. A.

& F. Co. v. Capital City Dairy Co. (Ohio St.) 395

19. The validity of a transaction by a corporation is to be determined from its general character considered as a whole, rather than by segregating it into individual parts, and regarding each as distinct from the others. Id.

20. Option contracts providing for the sale of plants organized for the manufacture of glucose to a corporation organized to do a banking business and having no authority to purchase such plants, are void. Harding v. American Glucose Co. (Ill.) 738

Officers.

21. The acts of trustees of a corporation elected in strict conformity with the by-laws of the corporation for a long period of time, during which their title was unquestioned, will be regarded as entirely legal, although they were elected by holders of stock which the corporation had no power to create. Cooke v. Marshall (Pa.) 413

22. Original members of a corporation, who organized and chose officers to represent the corporation as their successors, cannot, after the lapse of thirty-two years, ignore their former action, and choose new officers upon discovering that the original choice was illegal, where, in the meantime the affairs of the corporation have been regularly carried on under the belief that the first action was legal. Id.

Stockholders' rights.

23. A stockholder has the right to maintain a suit to enjoin the corporation from entering an illegal trust, where the effect will be to subject the charter to forfeiture and destroy the value of the stock, since it will, in any event, close down the business of the corporation, and prevent the further earning of profits. Harding v. American Glucose Co. (Ill.) 738

24. A stockholder of a corporation may bring an action on behalf of himself and others who shall come in and become parties, to prevent the officers and a majority of the stockholders of the corporation from dealing wrongfully with the corporate property to the injury of stockholders, where it is reasonably certain that a demand upon the proper officers to bring the action would be unavailing. Id.

CORPSE.

1. A widow having by statute the primary right to administer upon the estate of her intestate husband has a right to control the interment of his body, and a waiver of the right to administer will not include a waiver of such right of control, unless it is made to do so expressly. Pettigrew v. Pettigrew (Pa.) 179

2. The direction of a person as to the disposal of his body after death is entitled to respectful consideration when the question comes before the court, whether it is controlling or not. Id.

5. A widow should be permitted to remove the body of her deceased husband from the lot of his father, where she had consented to its burial, in order to place it upon a lot purchased by her for that purpose beside his only child, who desired it to be done, where the child and widow could not, for lack of room, be buried where the father was, and family hostility would probably prevent such course if it was physically possible. Id.

2. A strip of land along the margin of a navigable river, dedicated on a city plat as a "levee," is not abandoned by the public, so as to cause a reverter to the original dedicators or their representatives, because railroads have been permitted to lay their tracks and build depots upon it, and its use has been permitted for other unauthorized purposes, or because river commerce has ceased, and boats do not land upon it, and approach to the river margin has become difficult. Id.

DISCOVERY.

1. At common law, courts have no authority to order an examination of the person of one alleged to have been injured by the negligence of another for the purpose of ascertaining the extent of the injuries. Austin & Northwestern R. Co. v. Cluck (Tex.) 494

2. The court cannot, in the absence of express legislative authority, direct the plaintiff in an action to recover for personal injuries to submit to an examination of his person, under a constitutional provision that the people shall be secure in their persons from all unreasonable seizures and searches. Id.

3. In an action for damages for a negligent injury to the eyes, claimed to be permanent, a timely request for an expert physical examination of the injured organs in the usual and ordinary manner should be granted, although involving the use of drugs for dilating the pupils of the eyes; subject, however, to the limitation that the examination do not produce serious discomfort or any deleterious consequence. *Atchison, T. & S. 2. One who purchases a lot in a public cemetery for burial purposes, though the right of interment therein be exclusive, does not acquire any title to the soil, but only a mere easement or license, which will not support an action of ejectment. Doe ex dem. Stewart v. Garrett (Ga.) 99

3. The owner of the fee of land, subject to an easement of a public highway, may maintain ejectment against an intruder who wrongfully appropriates the same to a purpose wholly foreign to the easement; but his recovery of possession will be subject to the easement in question. Bork v. United New Jersey R. & C. Co. (N. J. Err. & App.) 836

4. The laying of a steam railroad longitudinally in a street, unless by authority of a legislative grant, express or implied, will be regarded as such an exclusive and wrongful appropriation of that part of the street to a purpose foreign to the easement as to sustain an action of ejectment by the abutting owner against the company. Id.

ELECTRICAL USES AND APPLIANCES.

Defective Insulation of Electric Light Wire, Burned off by Falling Telephone Wire, as Proximate Cause of Injury to Passerby, see PROXIMATE CAUSE, 4.

1. It is the absolute duty of an electric-light company conveying electricity by overhead wires strung through the streets of a city, to keep its wires constantly insulated so as to be prepared to guard against the effect of objects coming in contact with them, regardless of the facts and causes which may bring about the contact. Hebert v. Lake Charles I. L. & W. Co. (La.) 101

2. A wire of an electrical company, detached from the poles and lying in the streets of a town, is, of course, out of place, and those having control of it and charged with the legal duty of taking due care of it have the burden of accounting for its being found in that condition and situation, and to show that it was not due to its negligence. Id.

3. The fact that a telephone company may have strung its wires above those of an electric-light company already in position, without taking any steps to guard against the coming in contact of the wires of the two companies at the crossing points, and that in stringing its wires it did so, so negligently and loosely that one of them fell, in a storm, upon an uninsulated wire below, causing it to burn and fall on the street,—is no excuse to the electric-light company for not having performed its duty to keep its own wires properly insulated, and to take special precautions to guard against the increased danger caused by the telephone wires being strung above them. Hebert v. Lake Charles I. L. & W. Co. (La.) 101

4. The negligent breaking of the wires of an electric-light company, by which light and power are supplied under contract to the plant of a third person, who is thereby left for several hours without the means of conducting his business, does not render the wrongdoer liable for the resulting damages to such third person, although the latter is precluded, by the terms of his contract with the electric-light company, from recovering from it for damages occasioned by an accidental interruption of the current. Byrd v. English (Ga.) 94

Judicial notice.

1. The court will take judicial notice that the manufacture of wearing apparel in improperly ventilated, unsanitary, and overcrowded apartments will be likely to promote the spread of, if it does not engender, disease. State v. Hyman (Md.) 637

2. It is a matter of common knowledge that places for the accommodation and entertainment of travelers, such as hotels and taverns, steamboats and ocean vessels which carry passengers, almost universally sell to their guests and patrons whiskies, wines, and liquors, and that such things are regarded by a portion of the traveling public, and by those who transport and entertain them, as part of the "supplies" for travelers. People ex rel. Moloney v. Pullman's Palace Car Co. (Ill.) 368

Best evidence.

3. A card 5 or 6 inches square, tacked to the end of a wooden railway tie in a pile of ties loaded in a box car, discovered by a laborer engaged in unloading the ties for final use, bearing the printed words "Arkansas & Texas Tie Company," and the written words, "Creosote Treated Ties," is technically the best evidence of whatever information its inscription imparted; but, since it is obvious a card of that character is not intended to be preserved, and is not likely to be preserved, very slight evidence of its loss is sufficient to authorize parol proof of its contents; and a verdict will not be set aside because no other foundation for secondary proof than the foregoing facts is established. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Palmore (Kan.) 90

Parol evidence concerning writings.

4. Parol evidence is not admissible to show that a grant of land for "all legitimate railroad, depot, and warehouse purposes" was intended not to authorize the use of the land for the purpose of a hotel or eating house. Abraham v. Oregon & C. R. Co. (Or.) 391

A physician called by a stranger to furnish aid to one who has attempted suicide, and who is compelled to render his services against the will and opposition of the patient, is within the provision of the statute prohibiting a physician from testifying to facts learned while attending a patient in a professional capacity. Meyer v. Supreme Lodge K. of P. (N. Y.) 839

Declarations.

7. Evidence of declarations of the ticket agents and conductor of the train first boarded by the passenger is admissible upon the question of the carriage contract, where one desiring transportation between two points connected by different routes asks for a ticket by the longer route, over which runs the more desirable train, and receives one which does not specify the route; and it is immaterial that the regulations of the carrier, of which the traveler has no knowledge, require the use of the more direct route. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Harper (Miss.) 283

8. Before inscriptions upon a card tacked to the end of a railway tie in a pile of ties loaded in a box car, bearing the words "Creosote Treated Ties," can be offered in evidence as an admission of the truthfulness of the recitals, or as an admonition concerning the character of the ties, it must be made to appear that the party to be charged made the admission or had notice of the warning. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Palmore (Kan.) 90

Opinions and conclusions.

9. An expert in handwriting may give, not only an opinion, but the reasons for his opinion, in his examination in chief, and, for the purpose of illustrating and explaining his testimony, and conveying to the jury the reasons for his opinion, may be permitted to make illustrations upon a blackboard. State v. Ryno (Kan.) 303

10. A person who has been employed as a locomotive engineer for a long time, and who is qualified by experience and observation to understand the operation and effect of spark arresters in locomotives, may give testimony as to whether a locomotive equipped with a spark arrester in first-class condition would prevent the escape of sparks or fire from a locomotive sufficient to ignite and burn property on or near the right of way. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. v. Blaker (Kan.) 81

11. Physicians not claiming or pretending to know anything about the practice of magnetic healing are competent to testify as to the propriety, in any case, of giving particular treatment to a patient in the condition of one to whom it was given by such healers. Longan v. Weltmer (Mo.) 969

Hypothetical questions.

12. A hypothetical question may be predicated upon the testimony of plaintiff in an action to recover damages for malpractice. Id.

18. The mere fact that the excessive flow of water from one well interrupts that of several others does not tend to point out the location, course, or even the existence, of a subterranean stream. Barclay v. Abraham (Iowa) 255

19. To entitle one to recover damages for injuries negligently inflicted upon him by a magnetic healer from whom he is receiving treatment for disease he is not bound to show that the treatment received was not proper or usual in magnetic healing, but it is sufficient to show that it was not proper to be given in any case to one in plaintiff's condition at the time of receiving it. Longan v. Weltmer (Mo.) 969

20. The jury may disregard testimony as to the condition of appliances by the breaking of which a servant is injured, where, if it is reliable, it is utterly incomprehensible how the accident can have happened. Twombly v. Consolidated Electric Light Co. (Me.) 551

The jury may infer that dressed poultry was in good condition when delivered to a carrier for transportation from evidence that special pains were taken with it because of the hot weather, and that it was prepared by dressing, cooling it out, and packing it in ice, in barrels. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Naive (Tenn.) 443

Lincoln* (R. I.) 160

23. That one ordering a broker to purchase stock for him did not intend to receive the certificates is not sufficient to show that he did not intend an actual purchase by the broker on his account. Id.

24. That one ordering a broker to purchase stocks on his account had not the means of paying for them is not conclusive evidence that a mere wagering contract was intended, where the purchaser availed himself of the broker's credit and facilities for borrowing on the stocks themselves. Id.

Presumptions.

25. In the absence of evidence to the contrary, it will be presumed that a person about to cross a railroad track both looked and listened before venturing to do so. Kansas City-Leavenworth R. Co. v. Gallagher (Kan.) 344

26. In case of an accident to an employee, the fact of accident carries with it no presumption of negligence on the part of the employer, and it is an affirmative fact for the injured employee to establish, that the accident was the result of the negligence of the employer. Neeley v. Southwestern Cotton Seed Oil Co. (Okla.) 145

27. The court will assume, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that the law of another state is the same as that established by a local statute permitting the suspension of business on legal holidays. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Naive (Tenn.) 443

31. When a shipper has shown that the property was delivered to the initial carrier in good condition, any carrier against which suit is brought for negligent injury to the property has the burden of showing that the injury was not caused by its negligence. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Naive (Tenn.) 443

Variance.

32. Evidence of the death in another county of one mortally wounded in the county where the trial is had is not inadmissible in aid of a prosecution for murder on the ground that there is a variance from the indictment charging the killing within the county, where the statute permits trial of the offender in either county. Coleman v. State (Miss.) 807

33. That the complainant in an action for injuries caused by the fall of an insecure timber from a lumber pile alleged that the timber was insecure because of the defective condition of the derrick by the chains of which it was partially suspended, will not prevent a recovery in case it is shown that the timber was not in the chains, nor will it prevent the introduction of evidence of other causes of insecurity, where it expressly alleges that the injury was caused by defendant's negligence and carelessness in placing and leaving the timber. Busse v. Rogers (Wis.) 183

St. Louis* (Mo.) 292

HOMESTEAD.

1. The purpose of the statute of descents and distributions is to provide for the transmission of title at death in case of intestacy, and to regulate the division of estates among heirs; it is not primarily an exemption or homestead law; and, though it may enlarge the right to an exemption of real estate from appropriation to the payment of debts, it cannot restrict the constitutional guaranty. Cross v. Benson (Kan.) 560

2. The constitutional exemption of a homestead from forced sale under process of law may survive to the family of its owner after his death. Id.

3. If a husband and wife occupy a tract of land belonging to him as a homestead, she is the family of the owner, within the meaning of the Constitution; and his death does not deprive her of the right to continue to be so designated, in order to maintain the homestead, to which she takes title, and which she continues to occupy, free from forced sale under process of law for the payment of his debts. Id.

4. Upon the death of her husband, a wife may elect to take title under his will to their homestead, which she continues to occupy, without subjecting it to the payment of his debts. Id.

5. The use of merely formal phrases will not make a devise of a homestead subject to the payment of the testator's debts; to do so, the language employed must be unequivocal and imperative. Id.

6. A minor child who resides with her grandparents under such circumstances that she becomes in fact dependent upon them and they become morally responsible for her nurture becomes a member of their family, within the meaning of the homestead provision of the Constitution, without formal adoption; and this is true, even though her father, who is divorced from her mother, still lives and has a decree of court awarding her custody to him. Id.

State* (Ind.) 942

2. One charged in an information with shooting with intent to kill with a deadly weapon, under Kan. Gen. Stat. 1901, § 2023, may, upon sufficient proof, be convicted, under § 2027 of the same act, of a wounding under circumstances that would have constituted manslaughter in the fourth degree if death had ensued. *State v. 2. Acts which disturb physical comfort to an injurious extent may be restrained by the interposition of the courts. Id.

3. Equity will not wait for the determination of the fact of nuisance in an action at law before enjoining the operation of a hospital in close proximity to a private residence, where the evidence clearly shows that it not only destroys the peace, quiet, and comfort of those living in the residence, but seriously and injuriously affects their health, and occasions irremediable injury. Deaconess Home & Hospital v. Bontjes (Ill.) 215

4. A track erected on pillars from 15 to 25 feet above the surface of the street for carrying railroad trains is inconsistent with the use of the place as a public street, and, although title to the fee is in the public, an abutting owner may enjoin the use of such track until compensation is made for the injury thereby inflicted on him. De Geofroy v. Merchants' Bridge Terminal R. Co. (Mo.) 959

5. Equity will not interfere to enjoin one with whom margins have been deposited in a stock-gambling transaction from violating his agreement to keep them upon deposit in a bank until the transaction is closed, and prevent his withdrawing them from the bank, although he intends to remove the funds from the state, and thereby defraud the complainant. *Baxter v. 1. An association, established by a railway company, composed of some or all of its employees and the company, for the purpose of accumulating and maintaining a relief fund created by the voluntary contributions from their wages by employees who apply for membership in said fund and are admitted; the railway company to take charge of, and be responsible for, the funds, make up deficiencies in the same, supply facilities for conducting the business, and pay the operating expenses, supply surgical attendance for injuries received in its service, and to pay the members or their designated beneficiaries the stated share of the benefit fund so raised from wages retained by the company,—is not an insurance company or association; and, in agreeing to perform and in performing each and all of said acts, such railway company is not engaged in the transaction of insurance business. *State ex rel. 2. The minority of one taking out a policy of fire insurance does not exempt him from complying with a stipulation therein that any action or suit for recovery on any claim must be brought within twelve months after the fire, the policy being issued and the loss occurring before the passage of Kan. Laws 1897, chap. 91, p. 182, forbidding such contracts; and an action brought several years after the loss occurs, when the insured attains his majority, is barred. Mead v. Phoenix Ins. Co. (Kan.) 79

4. One who, without knowledge of the facts, takes an assignment of a policy or life insurance which, under the statute, is void because taken, without his consent, upon the life of one in whom the applicant has no insurable interest, and pays the premiums thereon in reliance upon the assurance by the agent of the company, confirmed by its vice president, that the policy is valid and the assignment good, may recover back the premiums paid. American Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Bertram (Ind.)

Assignment.

5. The contingent interest in the proceeds of a life insurance policy, which are payable to the wife of the assured, should she survive him, otherwise to his "executors, administrators, or assigns," is vested in him, and not in his representatives, as a special class, for the benefit of his heirs, so that he can dispose of it by assignment prior to the death of his wife. Lanier v. Box (Tenn.)

458

6. The assignment by a man to his wife of his contingent interest in a policy of insurance on his life, which is payable to her should she survive him, but to his personal representatives or assigns in case she dies before he does, devests him of all interest in the policy, so that, in case he survives her, he will acquire a right to the proceeds of the policy, if at all, by virtue of his right as surviving husband, and not under the terms of the policy. Id.

7. A parol assignment, accompanied by delivery of the policy, is sufficient to transfer the right to the proceeds of a life insurance policy. Id.

Warranties and representations.

8. Violation of a provision in a fire insurance policy that it shall be void unless an inventory and books of account are kept in a fire-proof safe is within the operation of a statute providing that false warranties shall not avoid the policy, unless made with intent to deceive, or unless they increase the risk. Continental Fire Ins. Co. v. Whitaker (Tenn.)

451

9. Misrepresentation as to the state of title cannot be charged against the applicant for fire insurance where he states the title correctly, and it is erroneously written in the application without his knowledge by the agent of the insurer. Id.

10. Misrepresentations as to encumbrances do not increase the risk, so as to avoid a policy of insurance on the property, where the statute provides that misrepresentations shall not avoid the policy, unless they increase the risk, or are made with intent to deceive. Id.

11. A fire insurance policy is not avoided by misrepresentations as to encumbrances on the property where the applicant made no representations upon the subject, but the statement was inserted by the company's agent without knowledge of the applicant, and he signed the application without reading it. Id.

Waiver.

12. Knowledge by the agent of the insurer that the insured occasionally rode in steeple chases does not constitute a waiver of a provision in the policy that the insurer shall not be liable for injuries received through voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger. Smith v. Aetna Life Ins. Co. (Mass.)

117

Cause of death or injury.

668

14. Negligence of an assured, resulting in his death, is not within the provision of a life insurance policy that it does not include assurance against self-destruction or suicide. Id.

15. Steeple-chase riding by one who gives his occupation as a cotton merchant is voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger, within the meaning of an accident insurance policy exempting the insurer from liability for injuries resulting from such exposure. Smith v. Aetna Life Ins. Co. (Mass.)

Proof of loss.

17. Failure to furnish proofs of loss within the time required by a fire insurance policy does not prevent an enforcement of the policy where such failure is not, while other things are, made a ground of forfeiture by the policy, and proofs of loss are furnished before suit is brought. Continental Fire Ins. Co. v. Whitaker (Tenn.)

1. The "trust fund" mentioned in Ohio Rev. Stat. 1892, § 3206a, providing that, where property of an employer is placed in the hands of a receiver or assignee, claims for labor performed within three months prior to the appointment of the receiver or assignee shall be first paid out of the trust fund, in preference to all other claims, is the general fund remaining after the payment of valid securities and liens, obtained in good faith for value, against the property in the hands of the assignee or receiver. St. Marys Machine Co. v. National Supply Co. (Ohio) 845

2. Claims for labor do not take precedence of the lien of a chattel mortgage, upon the appointment of a receiver who takes possession of the mortgaged chattels after condition broken, under Ohio Rev. Stat. 1892, § 3206a, providing that, where property of an employer is placed in the hands of an assignee or receiver, claims for labor performed within three months prior to the appointment of such assignee or receiver shall be first paid out of the trust fund, in preference to all other claims; since the mortgaged chattels, to the extent that they are required to satisfy the mortgage, are the property of the mortgagee, and not of the mortgagor. Id.

3. The provision of the Kansas mechanic's lien law, that, "in case of action brought, any lien statement may be amended by leave of court in furtherance of justice, as pleadings may be in any matter, except as to the amount claimed,"—permits an amendment correcting the description of the property and the name of the owner, and does not thereby authorize the taking of property without due process of law. *Atkinson v. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS.

On Insurance Policy Imposing Limitation, as Affected by Insured's Minority, see INSURANCE, 2.

Merchants Bridge Terminal R. Co. (Mo.)* 959

2. The statute of limitations does not begin to run against a right to recover back premiums paid by an assignee of a void life insurance policy until the invalidity of the contract is discovered, and further obligation thereon disavowed, and demand made for a return of the premiums paid. American Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Bertram (Ind.) 935

3. A foreign corporation transacting business in a state cannot plead the state statute of limitations in bar of a cause of action originating in the state in favor of a resident. Williams v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. (Kan.) 794

Chattanooga Foundry & Pipeworks (C. C. App. 8th C.)* 721

5. An action by one injured by being compelled to pay an excessive price for supplies because of a combination in violation of the anti-trust act, to recover three times the amount of the loss as authorized by the 64 L. R. A.

MANDAMUS.

1. Mandamus will lie to compel the reinstatement of a student wrongfully expelled from a law school without notice. Baltimore University v. Colton (Md.) 108

2. An action for breach of contract is not an adequate remedy for the wrongful expulsion of a student from a law school, thereby depriving him of the opportunity of obtaining a diploma and degree to which, under his contract, he is entitled. Id.

3. The existence of an equitable remedy will not defeat a right to a writ of mandamus. Id.

4. Although the right of a taxpayer to examine the books of a municipal corporation is absolute, the court has discretion to refuse to enforce it by mandamus, unless a proper case for the exercise of that right is shown. State ex rel. Wellford v. Williams (Tenn.) 418

5. A writ of mandamus to enable a taxpayer to secure a general examination of the books of the municipal corporation should be allowed where a period of several years is to be covered, and, notwithstanding the collection of vast sums as taxes which are heavy and burdensome, and the borrowing of additional sums, and the opportunity to secure from the legislature the means of raising additional taxes, the mayor finds it necessary to call a meeting of taxpayers to devise means of paving and repairing streets in the city. Id.

6. Mandamus will not lie to compel the levy of a tax to pay the contract price for water furnished a municipal corporation, where the contract was ultra vires on the 64 L. R. A.

part of the municipality because for a period extending beyond its power to contract, or which fixes a basis for determining the compensation which may, by changing circumstances, exceed the powers of the municipality or become unreasonable. Westminster Water Co. v. Westminster (Md.) 630

MASTER AND SERVANT.

Complaint in Action for Furnishing Unsafe Lodging for Servant, see PLEADING, 5.

Burden of Proving Master's Negligence, see EVIDENCE, 26.

Duty and Liability of master.

1. An employer who undertakes to furnish a domestic servant with a lodging place is bound to see that it is suitable for the purpose intended and is liable for injuries caused to the servant by sickness due to the leaky condition of the roof. Collins v. Harrison (R. I.) 156

2. A master is not shown to be negligent in employing an engineer by evidence that he had been known to drink intoxicating liquor, where there is nothing to show that the master knew it, or that he had ever been intoxicated. Delory v. Blodgett (Mass.) 114

3. One employing servants whose duties require the use of long ladders cannot relieve himself from liability for injuries to a servant through the breaking of a rotten round, by showing that he had a foreman who had general oversight of all the appliances used in the business, with the general duty of seeing that repairs were made when necessary. Twombly v. Consolidated Electric Light Co. (Me.) 551

4. The master, and not the servant for whose use it is furnished, is bound, in the absence of special circumstances changing the rule, to inspect and repair a ladder furnished for the use of the servant, which is of such length that a defect in it will imperil the servant's life or limb. Id.

Assumption of risks.

5. A corporation is not liable for injuries to its employee in attempting to rescue one of its members, who, in superintending and working with the employee, undermines a wall so that it is about to fall upon him, when the employee springs forward from a place of safety to avert the impending accident. Saylor v. Parsons (Iowa) 542

6. The risks assumed by an employee are such perils as exist after the employer has used due care and precaution to guard the former against danger by providing him a reasonably safe place to work in, reasonably safe appliances to work with, reasonably safe materials to work upon, and reasonably competent fellow servants to work with; but when the employee undertakes to use defective or unsafe appliances, with knowledge of such unsafe condition, he assumes the increased risk of danger, and the employer is relieved from responsibility to the employee by reason of the employee's knowledge. Neeley v. Southwestern Cotton Seed Oil Co. (Okla.) 145

7. An employee who, in reliance on his master's promise to repair a defective appliance, continues his work, and is injured by such defective appliance before the repairs are made, is ordinarily entitled to recover, but if the employer, before the accident, directly or indirectly revokes his promise to repair, the employee is not warranted in further continuing his service in reliance on such promise. Id.

8. A street-car conductor in charge of an extra car, whose duties require him to run onto a single track extending beyond the termination of the double tracks of the road, which the rules of the company require to be occupied by only one car at a time, takes the risk of injury from the absence of signals at the termination of the double tracks or schedules for extra cars for giving notice when the extension is occupied by such cars. Simmons v. Southern Traction Co. (Pa.) 205

9. A domestic servant is not deprived of a right of action against her employer for sickness caused by the leaky condition of the roof of the room furnished as her sleeping apartment by the fact that she continued to occupy it after learning of its unfit condition, if she did so under his promise to repair. Collins v. Harrison (R. I.) 156

Fellow servants and their negligence.

10. An expert machinist employed by a machine company and sent to make repairs upon plants of other persons at their request as his services may be needed, and who is, while so employed, subject to the direction of the one seeking his services as to what shall be done, although in his 64 L. R. A.

method of work he acts upon his own judgment, is, during the time so employed, the servant of the latter and the fellow servant of his employees, although he receives his wages from his own employer, who collects the pay for his time from those seeking his services. Delory v. Blodgett (Mass.) 114

11. It is the duty of the employer to provide the employee with reasonably safe machinery, tools, and appliances with which to do his work, and he cannot relieve himself from liability by delegating this duty to another; and in case of injury resulting from defective or unsafe appliances, the relations of fellow servants cannot arise. Neeley v. Southwestern Cotton Seed Oil Co. (Okla.) 145

12. The master cannot, by delegating to a servant the duty of inspecting long ladders furnished for the use of employees, and replacing rotten rounds, escape liability for injuries caused by neglect of the duty, on the ground that the neglect was that of a fellow servant of the one injured by a fall caused by the breaking of a rotten round. Twombly v. Consolidated Electric Light Co. (Me.) 551

Liability of master to third persons.

13. Employees of a mining partnership, who are charged with the care and management of its property, do not act within the scope of their employment in causing, long after the commission of the crime, the arrest, for the purpose of vindicating the law, of one who is suspected of having set fire to a building belonging to the partnership, so as to render the partnership liable for malicious prosecution in case the arrest proves to have been without justification. Markley v. Snow (Pa.) 685

Liability for acts of independent contractor.

14. A property owner is not liable for injuries to a traveler caused by obstructions placed in the street in front of the property without danger signals, by an independent contractor whom he has employed to construct a building on the property. Hoff v. Shockley (Iowa) 538

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Master and servant; injury to employee subjected to dangers which employer should provide against; duty of master to employ appliance in general use to guard against danger. 205

Providing suitable appliances and competent persons to attend to them as measure of master's duty; duty to inspect tools and appliances; liability for injury to servant from defective machinery or tools. 552

MINES.

Entry on Placer Location to Prospect for Lodes as Trespass, see TRESPASS.

1. The rejection by the Land Department of an application for a patent for a placer mining claim for the reason that there was not such a showing by the applicant as entitled him to a patent is not conclusive against the validity of the claim in a subsequent proceeding before the courts to establish it against subsequent locations of lode claims. Clipper Min. Co. v. Eli Min. & L. Co. (Colo.) 209

2. The determination by the government officials after notice to adverse claimants of the priority of a mining location and the issuance of a patent therefor is conclusive upon the question of seniority of location. Jefferson Min. Co. v. Anchoria-Leland Min. & M. Co. (Colo.) 925

Right to follow vein.

3. The right to follow a vein on its dip does not apply in favor of a patentee of a lode mining claim the exterior boundaries of which include a portion of a claim already patented to another which includes a portion of the apex of the vein, so as to enable the second patentee to follow the dip of the portion of the apex within the limits of his patent into the territory already patented to the prior claimant. Id.

4. The owner of a mining claim, who has a right to pursue a vein apexing within it, beyond its side lines, is confined to operations within and upon the vein itself; and he cannot drift a tunnel from his claim into the adjoining one for the purpose of intersecting the vein in its descent. St. Louis M. & M. Co. v. Montana Min. Co. (C. C. App. 9th C.) 207

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Mines; right to follow vein on dip; vein extending between boundaries of two claims; right to work belongs to first location; rights of patentee relating back to date of location of claim; statutory limitation of width of mining claim. 927

Right to follow vein on dip beyond side lines; extending tunnel from claim into adjoining one; conclusiveness of description in grant on question of what passed by patent; necessity of express grant to confer right to hold and use mines; conclusiveness of issuance of patent as to rights of patentee. 207

1. The Federal anti-trust act should have a reasonable construction,—one which tends to advance the remedy it provides, and to abate the mischief at which it was leveled. Whitwell v. Continental Tobacco Co. (C. C. App. 8th C.) 689

2. Acts, contracts, and combinations which promote, or only incidentally or indirectly restrict, competition in commerce among the states, while their main purpose and chief effect are to foster the trade and increase the business of those who make and operate them, are not in restraint of interstate commerce, or violative of the anti-trust act of July 2, 1890, chap. 647, § 1. Id.

3. Attempts to monopolize a part of commerce among the states, which promote, or only incidentally or indirectly restrict, competition in interstate commerce, while their main purpose and chief effect are to increase the trade and foster the business of those who make them, were not intended to be, and were not, made illegal or punishable by the anti-trust act of July 2, 1890, chap. 647, § 2, because such attempts are indispensable to the existence of any competition in commerce among the states. Id.

4. Every contract, combination, or conspiracy, the necessary effect of which is to stifle, or directly and substantially to restrict, competition in commerce among the states, is in restraint of interstate commerce, and violates the anti-trust act of July 2, 1890, chap. 647, § 1. Id.

merce among the states, violates the anti-trust act of July 2, 1890, chap. 647, § 2. Id.

6. The restriction by a manufacturer, a corporation, and its employee, of the sales of its products to those who refrain from dealing in the commodities of its competitors, by fixing the prices of its goods to those who do not thus refrain so high that their purchase is unprofitable, while it reduces the prices to those who decline to deal in the wares of its competitors, so that the purchase of the goods is profitable to them,—is not violative of the anti-trust act of July 2, 1890. Id.

7. An agreement between publishers or and dealers in books, whereby they agree not to sell books of any kind to dealers who shall be suspected of selling copyrighted books at less than the net price fixed by the publishers, or who shall supply books to dealers who are suspected of making such sales, violates a statutory provision that every contract whereby a monopoly in the sale of any commodity of common use is or may be created, or whereby competition in the supply or price of any such article is restrained or prevented, or whereby, for the purpose of establishing or maintaining a monopoly, the free prosecution of any lawful business is or may be restricted,—is against public policy and void. Straus v. American Publishers Asso. (N. Y.) 701

8. A formal written agreement is not necessary to constitute an illegal trust; it is sufficient that concerted action showing an understanding or scheme is shown by the acts of the parties. Harding v. American Glucose Co. (Ill.) 738

9. An illegal trust is created by the conveyance, by the stockholders of several competing companies engaged in the manufacturing business, to one company organized for the purpose of taking their property and consolidating their interests. Id.

2. A ring for the finger, although an article of personal adornment, is a proper subject for a chattel mortgage. Salabes v. Casstelberg (Md.) 800

3. A sufficient description of a diamond ring for the purpose of a chattel mortgage is effected by specifying the weight of the stone, the style of setting, and the house where the owner resides and the ring is to be kept. Id.

4. After condition broken, the mortgagee under a chattel mortgage is the owner of the property covered by the mortgage, and the mortgagor has only a right of redemption. St. Mary's Machine Co. v. National Supply Co. (Ohio) 845

5. Where a receiver is appointed and takes possession of chattels covered by a chattel mortgage, after condition broken, as provided in Ohio Rev. Stat. 1892, § 3206a, such chattels, to the extent that the same may be required to satisfy the mortgage, are the property of the mortgagee, and not the mortgagor. Id.

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Mortgages; conflict of laws as to chattel mortgages. 353

Of chattels situated in other state, enforcement by courts of state; protecting rights of mortgagee against purchasers; lien of, follows property when taken into other state. 353

Sufficiency of description of mortgaged property; what may be the subject of a chattel mortgage; effect of absence of affidavit of mortgagee that mortgagor not required to pay tax levied upon interest; record as charging person with notice of terms and conditions; agreement of mortgagee to redeem mortgaged property wrongfully pawned, as nudum pactum; effect of default of mortgagor to vest title to property in mortgagee. 800

Interest of mortgagee under chattel mortgage; priority of labor liens over lien of antecedent mortgage. 846

Necessity of assent by mortgagor that mortgagee may take possession; possession surreptitiously obtained; no bar to action of ejectment by mortgagor, although debt not paid; effect, on validity of order for foreclosure, of failure to attach seal of court; when seal attached collaterally; right of mortgagee in possession under foreclosure proceedings believed by him to be valid. 320

Powers.

1. Charter authority to a municipal corporation to prohibit the erection of cow stables and dairies "within prescribed limits" includes power to prohibit them anywhere within the city limits. St. Louis v. Fischer (Mo.) 679

2. A municipal corporation has no power to contract to levy 5 cents on each $100 of assessed property within its limits, in perpetuity, in payment for a water supply, under a statute authorizing it to levy annually a tax not exceeding that amount, "and out of the proceeds to pay the water company such sum as the mayor and common council may deem proper." Westminster Water Co. v. Westminster (Md.) 630

3. A municipal corporation has no power to contract to pay a water company for a water supply a sum annually, in perpetuity, equal to 5 cents on the $100 of the "present valuation of assessment," under a statute authorizing it to levy annually a tax not exceeding 5 cents on the $100 of assessed property. Id.

Ordinances.

4. An ordinance of a municipality having power to prohibit and regulate dairies within the city limits, forbidding a dairy within such limits unless permission for their maintenance is obtained from the city council, is not void as providing for special privileges. St. Louis v. Fischer (Mo.) 679

5. An ordinance prohibiting the maintenance of dairies within the city limits is not rendered retroactive and void by being made applicable to premises on which a dairy once existed which has been abandoned, so as to entitle a subsequent occupant of them to re-establish the business notwithstanding the ordinance. Id.

Liability for damages.

6. A municipal corporation is not liable for the acts of its officers, who, in attempting to guard the public health, remove a smallpox patient to a pesthouse so overcrowded and illy adapted to its purpose that he dies from the consequent exposure. Twyman v. Frankfort (Ky.) 572

7. Failure of a municipal corporation to appoint a board of health will not render it liable for injuries to private individuals through the efforts of its other officials to enforce its health ordinances. Id.

8. That a municipal corporation has passed an ordinance directing the removal to a pesthouse of persons afflicted with smallpox does not render it liable for the negligent acts of its officials in enforcing the provisions of the ordinance. Id.

9. A municipal corporation is not rendered liable for the result of acts undertaken for the preservation of the public health, by a statute providing that in case of death by wrongful act damages may be recovered from the corporation causing it. Id.

Right to inspect books.

10. A citizen and taxpayer of a municipal corporation is not deprived of the right to inspect its books by the facts that an ordinance requires the submission of the books to the inspection of certain officers or committees appointed by them, and that the grand jury has a right to make such inspection. State ex rel. Wellford v. Williams (Tenn.) 418

11. That one seeking to inspect the books of a municipal corporation is politically hostile to their custodian does not deprive him of the right of inspection, unless it is sought with the corrupt purpose of merely furthering such animosity. Id.

12. That inspection of the books of a municipal corporation by a taxpayer will produce worry and inconvenience, and that the transactions shown by them are numerous and involve vast amounts of money, are not sufficient grounds for denying the inspection. Id.

13. A citizen and taxpayer should be allowed by the court to make a general examination of the books of the municipal corporation when it is shown to be important to the public interests that such examination be made. Id.

14. The right to make a general examination of the corporate books by a taxpayer of a municipal corporation should not be lightly granted, or permitted with unnecessary frequency; the occasion should be grave and important; and the persons seeking the examination should be trustworthy and reliable, and at all times and at every stage subject to the supervision of the court.

Id.

15. Pending judicial proceedings to obtain the privilege of making a general examination of the books of a municipal corporation cannot be thwarted by the appointment of a committee on the part of the custodian of the books, or his associates in authority, to make an examination in lieu of the one sought.

1. A corporation cannot be held liable to one who is injured in attempting to save its superintendent from peril, on the ground that it ought to have anticipated that, when the superintendent placed himself in peril, someone, upon discovering that fact, would attempt to shield him, where there is nothing to show that the work undertaken by the superintendent might not have been done with safety; since the company was not bound to assume that the superintendent would needlessly expose himself, or that, in case he did so, someone would imperil his own safety to rescue him. Saylor v. Parsons (Iowa)

2. The manufacturer of a buggy, who sells it to a municipal corporation for the use of one of its employees, representing it to be strong and in good condition, but knowing that it is in fact defective, the defect being so concealed by the use of paint and grease that the purchaser cannot detect it, is liable in damages to the person whose use of the buggy was contemplated at the time of the sale, for injuries caused by such defect, although there was no privity of contract between the plaintiff and the defendant in the sale of the buggy. Woodward v. Miller (Ga.) 932

3. One who, in using the street adjoining his property as part of his lumber yard, piles lumber there in an unstable manner, is liable for injuries caused by its fall upon a child who, while traveling along the street, follows its inclination to play, and attempts to climb upon the pile, and thereby causes the timber to fall. Busse v. Rogers (Wis.) 183

Imputed negligence.

4. There is no basis for imputing to an infant passenger on a street car any negligence on the part of his mother, in whose care he is, which proximately contributes to his injury, where he is thrown from the car by its jolting, unless the facts show heedlessness on the part of the child and negligence on the part of the mother in failing to prevent his incautious act. Nashville Railway v. Howard (Tenn.) 437

5. A child four years old is not negligent in sitting alone on the seat of an open street car, holding on to the seat guard, so that, in case he is jolted from the seat and injured by the car crossing a defect in the track, the negligence of his mother, with whom he is traveling, in permitting him to occupy such position, can be imputed to him. Id.

Contributory negligence.

6. The placing of structures on the right of way of a railroad company, which are permitted to remain there with the consent of the company until they are negligently set on fire by a passing locomotive, which fire extends to and burns other and adjoining property, does not constitute contributory negligence on the part of the owner, or deprive him of the remedy given by law for the negligent burning of property not on the right of way. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. v. Blaker (Kan.) 81

2. An offensive occupation cannot be carried on to the very great annoyance of one dwelling immediately near. Froelicher v. Oswald Iron Works (La.) 228

3. A hospital will not be permitted to be conducted in such proximity to a private residence that the sights, sounds, and smells which are a necessary part of its operation become an intolerable nuisance to those dwelling in the residence. Deaconess Home & Hospital v. Boutjes (Ill.) 215

4. That the persons responsible for the management of a hospital were not aware that it was being conducted so as to be a nuisance to adjoining property owners is no objection to the granting of an injunction against its operation in such manner. Id.

2. A register of deeds may, by agreement, search the records of his office to ascertain whether persons signing a petition for a liquor license are freeholders, for persons who, under the rules of the excise board of a city, are required to make proof of the qualifications of such signers by his certificate, and may collect and receive such compensation as may be agreed upon therefor. Id.

3. Id.

4. A register of deeds who searches the records of his office to ascertain whether persons signing a petition for a liquor license are freeholders, for persons who, under the rules of the excise board of a city, are required to make proof of the qualifications of such signers by his certificate, must place the fee for his certificate and seal on his fee book, and account for and pay the same over to the county, if in excess of the salary allowed him by law; but he cannot be compelled to account for and pay over the amount received by him for his labor in searching the records. 64 L. R. A.

2. An examination and license as for a practitioner of medicine and surgery cannot be required for the treatment of disease by baths, physical culture, the manipulation of muscles, bones, spine, and solar plexus, and advice as to diet. Id.

3. In an action against a physician and surgeon for negligence and unskillfulness in applying to plaintiff's body the device known as "Roentgen's X-rays" for the purpose of locating a foreign substance thought to be in his lungs, the rule of liability is the same as that applied in other actions for malpractice, and one of ordinary care and prudence. Henslin v. Wheaton (Minn.) 126

4. A physician who applies the X-rays, not for medical purposes, but to locate a foreign substance in the body of his patient, is not entitled to have the question of his care and skill in applying it determined by the opinions of physicians of his own school. Id.

5. To render a magnetic healer liable for injuries caused by magnetic treatment of a patient it is not necessary that he should be, or claim to be, a practising physician; it is sufficient that he undertakes to cure plaintiff's malady, and inflicts injury by negligent or unskillful treatment. Variance between Pleading and Proof in Negligence Action, see EVIDENCE, 33.

1. The defense that the statute prevents the maintenance of an action because the instrument on which it is brought is not signed by the party to be charged may be raised by a plea of the general issue. Third Nat. Bank v. Steel (Mich.) 119

Complaint.

2. One seeking to recover a reward offered by a public statute need not allege that he rendered his services with the knowledge that the reward was offered, or with intention to earn the same. Clinton County Comrs. v. Davis (Ind.) 780

3. Allegation of the contract relations in an action to recover for failure accurately to transmit a telegram does not necessarily make the action one upon contract, since that matter may be pleaded by way of inducement to an allegation of facts constituting a tort. Cowan v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (Iowa) 545

4. The sender of a telegram which was altered in transmission need not allege freedom from contributory negligence, in an action to recover for the injury thereby caused to her, where the statute makes telegraph companies liable for mistakes in transmitting messages, and provides that, in actions to recover damages, the burden is upon the company to prove that the mistake was not due to its own negligence. Id.

5. Setting up a promise to repair as a ground for continuing service, in an action by a servant against her employer for injuries caused by an unsafe lodging place, does not render the complaint bad for duplicity, as counting upon both contract and tort. Collins v. Harrison (R. I.) 156
Demurrer.

6. Demurrer to a special traverse admits the truth of the statements made in the plea, and raises the question of the sufficiency of the matters stated in the inducements to the plea to constitute a valid defense. People ex rel. Moloney v. Pullman's Palace Car Co. (Ill.) 366

7. Where the facts constituting an estoppel to the maintenance of the action affirmatively appear on the face of the petition the defense may be interposed by demurrer without the necessity of a plea or answer. Stone v. Cook (Mo.) 287
Answer.

8. Answering to the same portion of a bill which is demurred to overrules the demurrer. Harding v. American Glucose Co. (Ill.) 738

9. That a paragraph of an answer alleging facts sufficient to constitute a defense to the action purports to be only a partial answer does not render it insufficient as to such part. Clinton County Comrs. v. Davis (Ind.) 780

10. A specification in an answer to a petition for recovery on a policy insuring against accident one who came to his death by eating spoiled oysters, the facts as to which are set out in the petition, that, if the death was so caused, it was because the oysters contained ptomaine poison, which would bring the death within one exception in the policy, does not preclude reliance upon another exception from liability in case of death from things voluntarily taken, where the allegations of the answer 64 L. R. A.

and petition together are sufficient to raise that defense. Maryland Casualty Co. v. Hudgins (Tex.) 349

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Pleading; effect of defective description of property in complaint; right to recover on cause of action not set out in complaint. 240

Right to prove acts of negligence not alleged in complaint. 184

PLEDGE.

A promise by a chattel mortgagee, who has a right to possession of the mortgaged property because of the default of the mortgagor, that, in case the mortgagor will surrender a pawn ticket representing the property, the mortgagee will redeem the property, cancel the mortgage, and consider the transaction closed, is without avail to the one who issued the pawn ticket with constructive notice of the rights of the mortgagee; since, having the exclusive right to the possession of the property, his promise is without consideration, and it is the duty of the pawnee, and not that of the mortgagee, to protect his interest by redemption. *Salabes v. PROXIMATE CAUSE.

1. Imperfections in the surface of a highway which give a traveler on a bicycle an impetus which results in his falling over an adjoining unrailed and dangerous embankment cannot, as matter of law, be regarded as the cause of the resulting injury to him. Hendry v. North Hampton (N. H.) 70

2. Failure to stop a street car at the destination of a passenger, by reason of which he is carried to the next street, is not the proximate cause of his falling on a slippery pavement in attempting to return to the point where he should have been permitted to leave the car. Haley v. St. Louis T. Co. (Mo.) 295

3. That the death of a person drowned by falling into the water while attempting to disembark from a barge in charge of a steamboat was caused partly by the negligence of the steamer whose passenger he was does not preclude a recovery for the death from another steamboat company whose negligence was also responsible for such death. Louisville & E. Mail Co. v. Barnes (Ky.) 574

4. The defective insulation of an electric-light wire, because of which it burns and falls to the ground when struck by a telephone wire strung above it so carelessly and loosely that it falls in a storm, is the proximate cause of the death of a person who comes in contact with it while passing along the street. *Hebert v. 2. The establishment by a railway company of an association composed of some or all of its employees and the company, for the purpose of accumulating a relief fund by voluntary contributions from the wages of the employees who are members, the company taking charge of the funds and attending to the details of carrying out the scheme, is within the implied powers of the railway company, and not ultra vires. *State ex rel. 1. While one part of a statute may be unconstitutional and void, and another part good, this is the case only where the portions are clearly separable and susceptible of separate enforcement; but when it is apparent that the entire faulty enactment is designed to constitute a complete whole, and that one part would not have been enacted except in connection with the other, if a part is found to be bad the entire statute must fall. Hanson v. Krehbiel (Kan.) 790

2. A statute requiring a mortgagee to warrant that he will not require the mortgagor to pay the tax imposed by statute upon the interest payable under the mortgage is not applicable to a mortgage under which no interest is payable, either directly or indirectly. Salabes v. Castelberg (Md.) 800

Co. v. Gallagher* (Kan.) 344

2. One about to cross a street-railway track in front of an approaching car has a right to rely upon a compliance with the law by the company, and to believe that the car is running at a lawful rate of speed and is under the control of the motoneer. Id.

SUNDAY.

1. A statute which prohibits the keeping open of butcher shops for the sale of meats, and other business places, on any portion of Sunday, while it authorizes confectionery and tobacco to be sold in an orderly manner on that day, is not such an unreasonable discrimination between these several occupations as to make the law invalid as special or class legislation. State ex rel. Hoffman v. Justus (Minn.) 510

2. The repairing of a belt in a factory so as to prevent 200 hands from losing a day's work the following day is within an exception to a Sunday law permitting works of necessity on that day, where the defect was not discovered until too late to repair it on Saturday with the appliances at hand, and the owner of the mill was not negligent in not having foreseen the accident, or having appliances at hand to repair it immediately. State v. Collett (Ark.) 204

What taxable.

1. The power to tax the exercise of a power of appointment by will is not destroyed by the fact that the power of appointment was created by deed prior to the passage of the statute providing for the tax. Re Delano (N. Y.) 279

2. The right to exist as a corporation is a franchise which may be assessed for taxation to the corporation, instead of the members or stockholders. Bank of California v. San Francisco (Cal.) 918

3. The right to exist as a corporation may be taxed as property, and the tax need not be in the form of an excise tax. Id.

4. A constitutional declaration that "property," for the purpose of taxation, shall include franchises, authorizes taxation of the right to exist as a corporation. Id.

5. A claim on a policy insuring the life of one who dies before the day on which property is to be valued for taxation is assessable under a statute providing for the assessment of claims due or to become due, although proof of death has not been made, and the insurer has sixty days after such proof in which to pay the demand. Cooper v. Board of Review of Montgomery County (Ill.) 72

6. The fact that the funds of a life insurance company are subject to taxation in its hands does not prevent the assessment of the value of an unpaid claim against the company in the hands of a representative of the assured,—at least, where the fund to meet the claim is to be raised by assessment, and it does not appear that 64 L. R. A.

the assessment has been made, or the fund collected at the time the tax is levied. Id.
Exemptions.

7. An establishment for the collection and distribution of electricity for the purpose of power and light is not for manufacturing purposes within the meaning of a statute permitting towns to exempt manufacturing establishments from taxation. Williams v. Warren (N. H.) 33

8. An exemption from taxation of a plant established to saw and dress lumber, and to collect and distribute electricity for power and light, is not effectual as to the portion devoted to the manufacture of lumber when it fails because of illegality as to the electrical apparatus, where there is nothing to show that the exemption would have been voted upon that portion had it been known that the remainder was not subject to exemption. Id.

Assessment.

9. The value of the shares of corporate stock may be taken into consideration in assessing the corporate franchises for taxation. Bank of California v. San Francisco (Cal.) 918

10. For the purpose of taxation, the value of a claim on an insurance policy promising the payment of an amount certain within sixty days after proof of death will be presumed to be measured by the face value of the policy. Cooper v. Board of Review of Montgomery County (Ill.) 72

Succession tax.

11. The succession tax cannot be assessed at the death of the testator upon the corpus of the estate when property is devised in trust which shall continue for a period of twenty years, during which time annuities shall be paid to certain persons named, among whom the estate shall be distributed at the expiration of that period if they are alive at that time, and, if they are not alive, among persons whom they shall appoint and certain persons named by the testator, under a statute authorizing a tax against a person who "shall become beneficially entitled, in possession or expectation, to any property or income thereof," where the tax rate differs according to the relationship to the testator of the person who ultimately becomes entitled to the property. People v. McCormick (Ill.) 775

12. A present succession tax cannot be assessed upon a remainder when it cannot be determined who will ultimately be entitled to it. Id.

13. A present succession tax cannot be imposed upon each annuitant to the full extent of his proportionate share of the entire fund from which the annuity is to be paid, although by joint action of all annuitants the entire income may be divided between them, where the will limits the amount to be paid to each in the absence of such joint action, and no increase can be made without the consent of all. Id.

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Exemption from; regarded as in derogation of common right; what is manufacturing establishment entitled to exemption; binding effect of contract of exemption; impairment of obligation of; invalidated by judicial change in construction of Constitution or statute; apportionment where part of capital is invested in property not used for manufacturing; effect of incidental employment of property in manufacture of articles not exempt. 34

Complaint in Action for Failure Accurately to Transmit Telegram, see PLEADING, 3, 4.

1. An action of tort will lie against a telegraph company for breach of a contract promptly to transmit a telegram, since there is also a breach of its public duty as a common carrier. Cowan v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (Iowa) 545

2. That a telegram sent by agent to principal is not delivered to the one in whose care it was directed by the agent according to the principal's instructions, in consequence of which it never reaches the principal, will not render the company liable for nondelivery at the suit of the agent, if it was delivered to another person whom the principal had authorized to receive messages for him. Western Union Teleg. Co. v. Barefoot (Tex.) 491

3. Delivery of a telegram to one authorized to receive it, who changes the address and returns it to the company to be forwarded, is a sufficient delivery to absolve the company from liability in case the message never reaches the addressee because the new address is incomplete. Id.

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Telegraphs; sufficiency of mental anguish and suffering to sustain action for default in transmitting message. 546

TRESPASS.

An entry upon a placer location to prospect for unknown lodes is a trespass, and no valid title to a lode claim can be initiated thereby, unless the placer owner has abandoned his claim, waives the trespass, or is estopped to complain of it. Clipper Min. Co. v. Eli Min. & L. Co. (Colo.) 209

TRIAL.

New Trial for Surprise in Introduction of Evidence, see NEW TRIAL.

1. The withdrawal of their answers, by the defendants, in a suit to enjoin the sale of property to an illegal trust will not prevent consideration of the evidence which had been taken under the issues formed by the answers in disposing of the case. Harding v. American Glucose Co. (Ill.) 738

Questions of law and fact.

2. When, on the trial of a cause, a question is presented as to the existence of negligence or contributory negligence, and the facts which the evidence reasonably tends to establish are such that all reasonable men 44 L. R. A.

must draw the same conclusions from them, the case is one of law for the court; but if fairminded men may honestly draw different conclusions, the cause should not be withdrawn from the jury. Neeley v. Southwestern Cotton Seed Oil Co. (Okla.) 145

3. The question of the contributory negligence of an employee in using a defective ladder to adjust a belt upon moving machinery, after he had complained of the hazard of using the ladder, and had been told by the manager that the ladder was all right, and if it did not suit him the manager would get someone who would use it,—is for the jury. Id.

4. Whether or not a person is guilty of negligence in attempting to cross a street railway track in front of an approaching car is generally a question of fact for the jury. Kansas City-Leavenworth R. Co. v. Gallagher (Kan.) 344

5. The sufficiency of the proof of a writing to be admitted as a standard of comparison is a question to be passed upon in the first instance by the court, but the weight and effect to be given the evidence by comparison, including the genuineness of the standards, is ultimately a question for the determination of the jury. State v. Ryno (Kan.) 303

Instructions.

6. A trial judge is not bound to explain to the jury, in an action to recover for injuries to a street-car passenger, the meaning of the words "as far as human skill and foresight will go," as measuring the carrier's duty to provide for the safety of the passenger, where he has not instructed them that such is the measure of the carrier's duty, but has merely told them that the carrier is bound to keep its appliances in reasonably safe order and condition. Nashville Railway v. Howard (Tenn.) 437

7. Refusal of the trial judge to instruct the jury that an infant passenger on a street car could not recover for personal injuries if the negligence of his mother, with whom he was traveling, proximately contributed to the injury, is not error, where there are no facts in the case to show such negligence. Id.

8. It is not error to refuse to give instructions which have no bearing upon the real case before the court. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Naive (Tenn.) 443

9. That a bill of lading admitted in evidence in an action to recover damages for a carrier's delay in delivering goods received by it for transportation was not actually read to the jury will not justify the court's refusal to give instructions based upon its terms. Id.

10. Where, in instructing upon the measure of damages, the court permits a recovery for certain injuries, "if any," and then adds, "together with" damages for other injuries, it is not necessary to repeat the words "if any," in case of every additional element of damages mentioned. Longan v. Weltmer (Mo.) 969

11. The whole question of the existence of probable cause is not submitted to the jury in an action for malicious prosecution by a modification of an instruction directing them that, if defendant had knowledge of certain facts, he had probable cause, by adding the qualification "unless the jury find" that other facts existed which ought to have convinced defendant, as a reasonably prudent man, that he could not honestly rely on the facts enumerated. Markley v. Snow (Pa.) 685

Nonsuit and direction of verdict.

12. A bill should not be dismissed as to defaulting defendants where it is sufficient to justify the relief prayed for, and its material allegations are sustained by the proofs. Harding v. American Glucose Co. (Ill.) 738

13. A nonsuit should not be granted if enough of the facts which are set forth in the complaint are established by the evidence, without substantial conflict, to constitute a good cause of action, although other allegations are not proved. Katz v. Walkinshaw (Cal.) 236

14. The court may withdraw a case from the jury and direct a verdict for the defendant, where the evidence is undisputed, or is of such conclusive character that the court, in the exercise of a sound judicial discretion, would be compelled to set aside a verdict returned in opposition to it. Neeley v. Southwestern Cotton Seed Oil Co. (Okla.) 145

15. A verdict cannot be directed for defendant in an action for malicious prosecution if his good faith is called in question by testimony, notwithstanding the existence of facts which might constitute probable cause. Markley v. Snow (Pa.) 685

16. A peremptory instruction to find for defendant cannot be given in an action for wrongful death, where the testimony tends to show that, while deceased was attempting to pass from a barge to a wharf boat, defendant made an unusual, unsafe, and dangerous landing at the wharf boat with its steamer in such a way as to cause the barge to separate from the boat and precipitate deceased into the water. Louisville & E. Mail Co. v. Barnes (Ky.) 574

Findings.

17. A finding that one committing murder was, at one time, desperate, does not require the inference that he was insane. Lanier v. Box (Tenn.) 458

3. A governmental grant of land adjoining a tidal body of water will not extend 64 L. R. A.

below high-water mark. Mobile Transportation Co. v. Mobile (Ala.) 333

Percolating and subterranean waters.

4. Water percolating from mountain slopes to the valley, where it reaches an impervious barrier, and is held under an impervious stratum of earth, so that, when the latter is perforated, the pressure from above causes artesian wells, cannot be regarded as a water course so as to confer riparian rights upon owners of the surface. Katz v. Walkinshaw (Cal.) 236

5. The owner of a portion of a tract of land which is saturated below the surface with an abundant supply of percolating water cannot remove water from wells thereon for sale, if the remainder of the tract is thereby deprived of water necessary for its profitable enjoyment. Id.

6. A landowner has a right to make such beneficial use of water from underground reservoirs in the improvement of his estate as he may choose. Barclay v. Abraham (Iowa) 255

7. There is no right to draw water from a common underground reservoir merely for the purpose of wasting it, to the injury of other landowners having equal rights to use and means of access to it, or of maliciously depriving them of its beneficial use. Id.

Tide lands.

8. The state alone can take advantage of a failure, by its grantee of lands under tide water, to fill them in as required by the terms of the grant. White v. Nassau Trust Co. (N. Y.) 275

9. The admission of a new state into the Union vests in it the title of the general government to the land under tide water as far as high-water mark within its territorial limits. Mobile Transportation Co. v. Mobile (Ala.) 333

10. Property between high and low water mark of a tidal river, held by a municipal corporation in trust for public use, will not pass by an act placing the property of the municipality in the hands of commissioners for the payment of its debts. Id.

Right to dredge.

11. The owners of a pier, having obtained from the state a grant of the adjacent land under water, may dredge it away to any proper depth to make it commercially useful, without liability to the owner of a neighboring pier which subsides because of the slipping of the intervening state lands towards the excavation. White v. Nassau Trust Co. (N. Y.) 275

Running logs.

12. The right of the public to the use of streams for driving logs is not paramount and unqualified, under Minn. Gen. Stat. 1894, § 2385, declaring that all rivers within the state of sufficient size for floating logs, timber, and lumber are public highways so far as to prevent obstruction to the free passage of logs, etc., but is subject to the incidental delays occasioned by dams, if the means of passage through or around them are reasonably sufficient for the purpose, since by § 2386 riparian owners are authorized to construct dams across such streams, provided they are equipped with locks, sluiceways, or booms sufficient and so arranged as to permit such materials to pass through without unreasonable delay. Crookston W. P. & L. Co. v. Sprague (Minn.) 977

13. A dam constructed with sufficient sluiceways to permit the free passage of logs, but which is not equipped with piling or piers to which sheer booms may be attached, or with some other means by which the logs may be directed to the sluiceways, does not meet the requirements of Minn. Gen. Stat. 1894, § 2386, authorizing riparian owners to construct dams across streams used for floating logs, provided they are equipped with locks, sluiceways, or booms sufficient and so arranged as to permit logs, timber, etc., to pass through without unreasonable delay; and it creates an unreasonable hindrance to the passage of logs at periods of high water, when it is difficult and impracticable to attach sheer booms, and guide the logs into the sluiceways, and keep them from running over the crest of the dam. Id.

14. The owner of logs, who permits them to pass over a dam (which, though constructed with sufficient sluiceways, is not equipped with piling or piers to which sheer booms may be attached, or provided with some other means by which logs may be directed to the sluiceways) without guiding them through the sluiceways by means of sheer booms, and without taking out the sluice boards, is not responsible for damage to the dam occasioned thereby, since the dam does not meet the requirements of Minn. Gen. Stat. 1894, §§ 2385, 2386, declaring all rivers of sufficient size for floating logs public highways, but authorizing riparian owners to construct dams across such streams, provided they are equipped with locks, sluiceways, or booms sufficient and so arranged as to permit logs, timber, etc., to pass through without unreasonable delay. Id.
